"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

EVE. LEDGER

OCT 20 1924

MUSICIANS BAN LENINGRAD

Boston Symphony Will Not Use Soviet Name for St. Petersburg

Boston, Oct. 20.—(By A. P.)—Complaints to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will bar the Soviet name for the Russian capital from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today said:

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky. I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK EVENING SUN

OCT 20 1924

Boston Symphony To Drop Leningrad

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints over use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated to-day. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CUMBERLAND, MD.

TIMES

OCT 20 1924

ORCHESTRA DROPS USE OF NAME OF LENINGRAD

Soviet Name for Capital of Imperial Days Eliminated from Musical Organization's Printing.

Associated Press.

Boston, Oct. 20—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Kousevitsky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 20 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY DROPS LENINGRAD FROM PROGRAMME

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programmes of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated to-day. Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitsky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programmes of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

1-2

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
OCT 20 1924

Boston Symphony Bars Name of Leningrad

BOSTON, Monday.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital eliminated from orchestra printing, it was intimated today.

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society; the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly paper that he owns Mr. Guild said in part:—

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Symphony director, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
OCT 20 1924

Name of Leningrad On Boston Programs Brings Complaints

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name "Leningrad," instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for the use of the name.

DENVER, COLO.
POST
OCT 20 1924

BOSTON PROTESTS AGAINST NAME OF LENINGRAD IN MUSIC PROGRAM; DIRECTOR DENIES RESPONSIBILITY

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, Monday disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

ORIGINAL PROTESTS

...INGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE DENVER
COLO.
TIMES
OCT 20 1924

Patrons Oppose Symphony's Use of Soviet's Name

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL
OCT 20 1924

Boston Protests Use of Leningrad By Its Orchestra

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and they took it from me."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Rus-

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
OCT 20 1924

Symphony Will Ban 'Leningrad' From Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of Imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name. "I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Lenigrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Hamel & Hayden Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA
NONPAREIL
OCT 20 1924

house.

BLUE PENCIL RUSSIAN NAMES IN PROGRAM

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing it is stated.

Serge Goushevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
TELEGRAM
OCT 20 19

LENINE NAME IRKS BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

(Other ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FITCHBURG
MASS.
SENTINEL
ISSUE OF
OCT 20 1924

MAY DROP USE OF SOVIET NAME

Russian Director Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Doesn't Want "Leningrad" On Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 20 (By Associated Press)—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a stattment disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it, because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

Oct 20

after Oct 31

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 20 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY DROPS LENINGRAD FROM PROGRAMME

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programmes of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days climinated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated to-day. Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitsky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programmes of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
OCT 20 1924

Boston Symphony Bars Name of Leningrad

BOSTON, Monday.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital eliminated from orchestra printing, it was intimated today.

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society; the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly paper that he owns Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

Serge Koussevitzky, the Symphony director, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

DENVER, COLO.
POST
OCT 20 1924

BOSTON PROTESTS AGAINST NAME OF LENINGRAD IN MUSIC PROGRAM; DIRECTOR DENIES RESPONSIBILITY

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, Monday disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

[illegible]
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE DENVER
COLO.
TIMES
OCT 20 1924

Patrons Oppose Symphony's Use of Soviet's Name

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL
OCT 20 1924

Boston Protests Use of Leningrad By Its Orchestra

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and they took it from me."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Rus-

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
OCT 20 1924

Symphony Will Ban 'Leningrad' From Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of Imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name. "I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Lenigrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Hamel & Hayden Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA
NONPAREIL
OCT 20 1924

house.

BLUE PENCIL RUSSIAN NAMES IN PROGRAM

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing it is stated.

Serge Goushevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
TELEGRAM
OCT 20 19[illegible]

LENINE NAME IRKS BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

(Other ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FITCHBURG
MASS.
SENTINEL
ISSUE OF
OCT 20 1924

MAY DROP USE OF SOVIET NAME

Russian Director Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Doesn't Want "Leningrad" On Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 20 (By Associated Press)—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a stattment disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it, because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

[illegible]

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
OCT 20 1924

Name of Leningrad On Boston Programs Brings Complaints

By The Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name "Leningrad," instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for the use of the name.

Oct 20

After Oct 31

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1861
From OCT 20 1924
BEE,
Sacramento, Cal.

Use Of Leningrad On Music Program Brings Protests In Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the orchestra, to-day disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO,
TEX.
EXPRESS
OCT 21 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BAR NAME LENINGRAD

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, Monday disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was Ambassador to Russia. In an editorial in his newspaper, Mr. Guild wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin, to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

DUBUQUE IA.
Herald
ISSUE OF
OCT 21 1924

'Leningrad' Taken Off Orchestra Programs

Boston, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburgh or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated. Serge Koushevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in pragrams of our orchtstra."

Among those protesting against tht use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES
OCT 21 1924

Russ Musicians Force "Leningrad" Off Program of Boston Symphony

By Associated Press.

BOSTON, Tuesday, Oct. 21.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing, it is stated

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE DANBURY CONN.
NEWS
OCT 21 1924

MUSICAL PROTEST.

Objection to Use of Name Leningrad on Programs.

Boston, Oct. 21. — Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, over the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak of it fearing I might offend some of my good Boston friends.

Among those protesting against use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part: "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor, in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TEL
OCT 21 1924

HONOR TO LENIN IS DENIED BY MUSIC LEADER

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial Russia eliminated from the program of the future it was intimated to-day. Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in Ermon and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak of it fearing I might offend some of my good Boston friends.

Among those protesting against use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part: "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor, in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

LOS ANGELES
CALIFORNIA
CALIFORNIA TIMES
OCT 21 1924

"LENINGRAD" BARRED ON MUSIC PROGRAM

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEADS AGREE TO REMOVE SOVIET TITLE

[BY A. P. NIGHT WIRE]

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was Ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
OCT 21 1924

NAME LENINGRAD BARRED

Orchestra Programs in Boston Will Outlaw Proposed Changes.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, Monday disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 21 1924

NAME OF LENINGRAD WILL BE ELIMINATED

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Drop It From Its Printing.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW LONDON
CONN.
OCT 21 1924

Leningrad.

The Bostonians who are angry with the Boston symphony orchestra because its program contains a reference to "Leningrad," nee "Petrograd," originally "St. Petersburg," suggest that Boston retains its ancient character of truculence. Leningrad is now as much the name of the erstwhile Petrograd as Boston is the name of what was once Shawmut. One doesn't have to revere the name of Lenine to accept the name when it is officially applied to a city.

It must be remembered that Leningrad was not named for St. Peter, but for Peter the Great, who was about as much a scoundrel in his way as Lenine.

160

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
OCT 22 1924

REALM OF MUSIC

By Frank H. Warren

WHILE one local orchestra—the Philharmonic—is pastiming in New England and a second—the State Symphony—is champing at the violin strings eager to go unloosed to-morrow night, a visiting band—the brilliant Philadelphians—slipped into Carnegie Hall last evening and awoke the echoes, spurred on by the rhythmic baton of Dr. Leopold Stokowski.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is one of America's best and on its merits deserves the enthusiastic following it has built up here. But there is no doubt that the public's failing toward a personable conductor with a personality has much to do with an orchestra's apparent popularity. And Mr. Stokowski is the dandy of conductors. There is a belief current that the Philadelphian's vogue is to be challenged by Serge Koussovitzky, the new Boston mentor and guide, who will make his bow here next month.

At any rate Mr. Stokowski was the fashion last night. He appeared promptly at 8.30 and, as he stepped on the stage, the hall lights were dramatically dimmed.

The orchestra made an excellent and artistic job of the first Brahms Symphony, playing it with such exhilarating verve and tang as to send the audience, after the first movement, into such animated discussion of the conductor that he was forced to rap loudly for quiet. The final movement, too, was remarkable for its sonority and brilliant climax.

The three Strawinsky pieces that followed—"Fireworks," an early work, somewhat noisy, that gave one opportunity to look over the program notes; an orchestral setting of the popular "Song of the Volga Boatmen" which, with its crashing "da-da-zing boom," seemed about as much in keeping with the simple melody as putting "Hard Times Come Again No More" in the hands of an orchestra; and extracts from the ballet "L'Oiseau de Feu" completed the program. These extracts probably meant much more to those who had seen the Diaghileff Ballet interpret the "Fire Bird." Without this mental picture we can't imagine how the "King Kastchei's Infernal Dance" music, for instance, would affect us. But "The Fire Bird" is important to remember because Strawinsky's vogue dates from its Paris hearing in 1910.

Mr. Hartman can be light and gay, as the music requires, even if his serious appearance belies an unbending attitude. The famous Bach Chaconne for violin alone received a scholarly, authoritative treatment that the audience easily recognized. The violinist's tone, while not always soul warming, and his intonation, occasionally uncertain, were forgotten in admiring his positive playing gifts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 22 1924

This indignation was directed toward Koussevitzky, whom they thought had insisted on "Leningrad" as the name of the capital city of his native land, and who some accused of using the sacred programs of the Boston Symphony to air his political views.—Boston Post.

Indignation hereby is directed toward those officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have objected to the use of the name Leningrad on the programs. Contempt hereby is felt for the Boston Post's English.

Doubtless Mr. Courtenay Guild, President of the Händel and Haydn Society and the Apollo Club, would like the Military Intelligence Division to censor the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "If we are pleased to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra," writes Mr. Guild in his Commercial Bulletin, "it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

Possibly they want to make an American patriot of Conductor Koussevitzky. To placate Boston it may be necessary for him to say to his orchestra as he raps with his baton: "Don't play till you see the whites of their eyes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 22 1924

Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, born in Darmstadt, Germany, 65 years ago today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
OCT 22 1924

of the American Stage, born, N. Y., 54 years ago to-day.

Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, born in Darmstadt, Germany, 65 years ago.

Giovanni Martinelli, the celebrated

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD
OCT 22 1924

Politics and the Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to be always in political difficulties. During the war it had to carry the burden of Dr. Karl Muck until the Department of Justice got something on him and he retired from the conductorship. Undoubtedly he was pro-German, and rather offensively so, and hardly anybody had any sympathy with him; but as a conductor he was supposed to possess great merit, and it is hard to see how there could be any sedition in music.

Now the new Russian conductor of the Boston orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, has encountered some unpleasantness because he referred to the former capital of Russia on the programs as Leningrad. An editorial from a publication owned by Courtenay Guild, a conspicuous patron of music, shows the character of the criticism which is being levelled at Koussevitzky. "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra," writes Mr. Guild, "it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

Mr. Guild ought to be able to see that if the designation of the Russian city on the Neva as Leningrad involves reverence to Lenin it is the Bolshevik who have shown that reverence. The city is theirs to name as they please. Within a decade it has had three names—St. Petersburg, Petrograd and now Leningrad. What the Russians call it is no concern of ours. If they want to name it Jonesboro it is their privilege. Nor have we any right to name it ourselves. If the Russians should take a notion that George Washington represented principles they detested and insisted on calling the capital of the United States Foster or Ruthenberg or Sovietville they would merely excite derision by what would be a presumptuous and silly gesture. If the former capital of Russia is, officially, Leningrad, there is no reason for our pretending it isn't even if we do not admire Lenin. A program of the Boston Symphony orchestra ought, it seems to us, to be accurate. What is more, who cares, in listening to a program of Russian music, whether Leningrad or Petrograd or St. Petersburg is the designation used? It to do with music any way?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible]
OCT 22 1924

"Musical Locomotive" Oct. 31

Arthur Honegger's musical impression of an express locomotive acquiring full speed, "Pacific 231,'" which was introduced to America by Serge Koussevitzky in Boston, will have its first performance in New York at the opening concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, at Carnegie Hall on Friday night, October 31. Another number on Mr. Damrosch's program to be heard for the first time here is Debussy's "L'Isle Joyeuse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
OCT 22 1924

To Do "Pacific 231."

We shall not, after all, have to wait another month and more till Mr. Koussevitzky comes chugging into town for the first hearing in New York of Arthur Honegger's tone poem about a gigantic locomotive entitled "Pacific 231." Walter Damrosch will bring it out at the initial concert for this season of the New York Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, October 31, in Carnegie Hall.

Another "first time in New York" on that occasion will be Molinari's orchestral version of Debussy's piano piece, "L'Isle Joyeuse." The program will include also Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Vaughan-Williams fantasia for double string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 22 192[illegible]

"LENINGRAD"

(Boston Herald)

Mr. Courtenay Guild and some others seem to be perturbed because the word "Leningrad" stands in the place of Petrograd, or St. Petersburg, in the programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It occurred to them that Mr. Koussevitzky had suggested or ordered the "substitution." The suspicion was wholly unwarrantable, ridiculous in fact, for the eminent conductor bears no good will toward the soviet government of Russia; he has suffered at its hands.

Unfortunately "Leningrad" is now the name of the city founded by Peter the Great in the marshes of the Neva in 1703, the city long known as St. Petersburg. After the revolution the name was changed to Petrograd. The soviet government has changed Petrograd to Leningrad,, and as Leningrad it is now known, however one may deplore the fact. "Leningrad" is the word recognized in political and journalistic circles.

If in years to come the name of Washington, D. C., should be changed by a wil-eyed government to Bryanville, the capital would then be known as Bryanville in all circles, foreign and domestic.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 22 1924

Protest Use of Name Leningrad

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your monoey and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia. In an editorial in his newspaper, he wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor.

LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
OCT 23 1924

SYMPHONY PLAYS AT LOWELL SOON

Lawrence won't have a chance to tra this season but Lawrence music hear the Boston Symphony Orches- lovers who have always supported the numerous concerts given hese by the world famous orchestra will be glad to learn that the orchestra will give one of its best programs at the Lowell Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, November 2.

Sergai Koussevitzky, the world famous Russian conductor, who has made a sensational success of the Boston concerts this season will conduct the Lowell concert. The program is an attractive one, because Kousevitzky is determined to make every critic that hears the Boston band agree—as in the days of Muck—that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest in the world.

Koussevitzky came to Boston this fall with a big reputation. He was admittedly the only world famous conductor who had not been to the United States. So much interest and curosty was attached to his coming that it was very much of a question whether he could come up to expectation. At the first rehearsals he quickly impressed his splendid personality upon the men. The word went out that Monteux—excellent leader that he has—had been forgotten in the eclipsing genius of the Russian. And the general public confirmed just what opinion when a fortnight ago the first performances were given.

Oct 23
After
Oct 31

Tomorrow's Symphony === Music and Plays

AT LONG LAST NOW ENTERS PROKOFIEV, RUSSIAN, PUR SANG

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY PREPARES HIS "SCYTHIAN SUITE"

Music of Primitive Tribe and Pagan Rite — Course and Origins, Procedure and Character—Kinship and Contrasts with Stravinsky — A Mighty Close — The Composer, Past and Present

FOR the first times, in a "Scythian Suite" to be played at the Symphony Concerts this week, Bostonians may hear the wild, barbaric savage and pagan music of Serge Prokofiev. Say fifteen years ago, he emerged from the Conservatory at Leningrad already accounted a prodigy. At any age, his piano-playing was phenomenal, while for a youth hovering about the twenties, his fecundity in composition was enormous. His teachers, with few exceptions, had been the most uncompromising of nationalists, and he knew from them that no Russian has ever been able to write first-rate European music. Even Chaikovsky was at his best when he consulted most fervently his racial origins, as in the opera, "Eugen Onégin." Nevertheless, the early years of this century were not free, even in Russia, from the influence of Wagner and Debussy. Skriabin's symphonic poems were the casus belli in the younger camps, and Stravinsky led the revolt against "Tristan" and "Pelléas." That sort of thing was no doubt very good for the French, or for Germans living in Venice; but it was not much help to Russia. Both Wagner and Debussy had made definite contributions. They had enlarged harmonic science, and they had sounded racial aspirations. But their particular additions to the technique of music were inseparable from the emotions they expressed.

For a young man determined, as was Prokofiev, to keep himself Russian at any cost, there was no other course but to follow Stravinsky. Not that it was necessary to employ exactly his musical methods or to infringe upon his individual style. But the sources of inspiration must be sought in a more primitive and a more pagan Russia than the five "Invincibles" had ever dared to embrace. This search for a real, an uncontaminated Russia, led the young Prokofiev to the ancient Scythians, the nomadic barbarians who ranged the northern shores of the Black Sea from the day of the prophet Jeremiah and the Emperor Darius through the exile of Ovid at Pontus and the decline of the Roman power. He read and absorbed what he might discover of Scythian legends, rites and tribal customs. To better purpose with composition in music, he let loose his imagination upon all things Scythian. His first design was a mimodrama or ballet for the stage. Soon, however, he preferred a Suite for the concert-hall. At length it was finished and in 1916 at Leningrad, the composer himself led the first performance of the piece. The occasion was comparable to the famous first hearing of Stravinsky's "Sacre" in Paris, except that there was no Debussy to rise in his place and with all the authority of prophet and patriarch to command the noisy crowd: "Shut up!" The "Scythian Suite" was a success—such a success that the director of the Conservatory—something himself of a prophet in his youth, but through years and vodka grown less in wisdom than in dignity—unable to endure music that was at once so Russian and so unlike his own, rose in his impotence and quitted the hall.

—

As the published score stands, each movement of the "Scythian Suite" bears a title, doubtless borrowed from the mimodrama, "Ala and Lolly," to which Prokofiev had originally schemed the music. The first division, "The Adoration of Vêlèss and Ala" (Scythian divinities), shows the conquest of energy by fear. It begins with a vigorous rhythmic figure which in slight variation persists throughout the movement. It accompanies in turn three themes of progressively weaker character and undergoes a sort of inverse development, or disintegration. The movement ends with the dissolution into vague nothingness, first of the melodic, then of the rhythmic, character of the beginning.

"The Enemy-God and the Dance of the Black Spirits"—the second division—is one of those musical expressions of evil which Prokofiev fondly achieves. It is sustained throughout by a rhythmic dance-figure similar to that of the first movement. A fierce and violent theme, and later a burlesque theme (a rather preposterous arpeggio for the bassoons) are intended to terrify and perhaps a little to amuse. A third theme introduces general confusion and the end is a helter-skelter fortissimo.

The third movement, labelled "Night," is finely poetic. The mood is invoked by a soothing little tune without rhythm and without accent, played on the piccolo. As the night advances, this tune appears in various developments, or rather say that it gives birth to fantastic imaginings, to fears, to frenzies, to stark terror. They rise in a terrific crescendo, until suddenly they disappear, leaving only the calm and tender theme of the piccolo. The Russian critic, Igor Glebov, speaks of this music as a depiction of "the bestial terror of primitive man before darkness and void."

The last movement, "The Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun," is a marcing song and a hymn to the light. The music rushes; a syncopated theme, incredibly gay, is heard. There is general excitement. Then appears the great martial rhythm. It catches everything else into it, develops and transforms it, and finally sublimates itself into a high and sustained radiance. There are not many passages in the music of these days as glorious as those final pages.

—

It is doubtful whether any of the actual melodic material of the "Scythian Suite" is of ancient origin. The tunes, in fact, are mostly chromatic phrases directly expressive of feeling rather than historically allusive. The harmonic style is a modified atonality. The word polytonality, which has sometimes been used to describe this style, is inexact, because no effort is here made to render audible a contrast between, say C major and E-flat major, when the tonic chords of those two keys are heard together. Prokofiev has, on the contrary, been very careful to blend them into a mass which would be without any tonality at all, were it not for the persistance (in the first movement, for example) of a low C in the bass, which attaches the piece firmly to that tonal center.

The orchestration, which is massive—eighteen brass instruments; quartets of wood-winds; nine instruments of percussion; tympani, two harps, celesta and pianoforte—is designed to increase this tonal blending. Every opportunity for sounding contrasting chords on contrasting instruments is avoided, while sonorities are massed rather than differentiated. There is a good deal of rhythmic counterpoint, as when violins or flutes play a rhythmic figure while the brass marches over quite alien chords. But the atonal character is so guarded in each separate contrapuntal element that there is none of that key-contrast which is essential to a polytonal system.

In this respect, as also in the emotional subject-matter, the "Scythian Suite" is similar to much of "Le Sacre du Printemps," though there the similarity ends. Rhythmic vitality, in particular, is expressed through opposite means; for where Stravinsky uses irregular prose rhythms, Prokofiev uses the strongly metrical. Again Prokofiev develops his rhythms and his themes, making one grow out of another. Stravinsky, in contrast, superposes one upon another like blocks of stone. Melodically Prokofiev is repetitious and chromatic; while Stravinsky is brief and diatonic. The "Sacre" is infinitely more cerebral and more sophisticated music than the "Scythian Suite" and there is no denying it to be a far richer and more varied experience for the listener. Prokofiev's music is the work of a young man of twenty-three, a genius beyond doubt, but still a youngster; and the first two movements are a bit amorphous. The third is, however, a piece of realized imagination; while the fourth is one of those revelations of glory that simply disarm the critic.

—

Since the Revolution of 1917, Prokofiev has dwelt in western Europe. He has appeared as a pianist in England, France, Italy, Germany, Spain, America and Japan. His compositions have been played, though not always with discretion on both sides of the Atlantic, and his apostle, Mr. Montagu-Nathan, was amused and somewhat annoyed that this prodigious composer, "this Rubinstein prize, this trump card of Siloti, this 'find' of Diaghilev" should make his début in London as the composer of an innocuous Scherzo for Four Bassoons.

When Prokofiev left Russia, at the age of twenty-six, the list of his pieces would have done credit to an industrious musician of seventy-six. It included four piano-sonatas, two piano-concertos, an opera, the "Scythian Suite," two symphonic poems ("Dreams" and "Autumn"), a "Symphony in the Classical Style," innumerable songs and miscellany, a ballet called "Chout," (The Buffoon) (since produced in Paris) an overture on Jewish melodies for clarinet, piano and string quartet, and a "Symphonic Exorcism: Seven Are They!" for orchestra, chorus and tenor recitation. The text of the "Exorcism" is a version by the Russian Balmont of a cuneiform hymn of the Akkadians (predecessors of the Assyrians), and has to do with the plotting of evil spirits against mankind.

Since Prokofiev's arrival in the Western world, he has composed his third piano-concerto (played by the composer in Paris in 1922), his fifth piano-sonata, songs for voice and orchestra without text, and two operas, "The Love of Three Oranges," produced by the Chicago Company in 1922, and "The Fire Angel." The violin-concerto, which remained in Russia, was destroyed by order of the Soviets, as were the second piano-concerto and "Seven are They!" The piano-piece, reproduced from pencil sketches which the composer's mother had rescued, was played in Paris last season. Before the winter is done Mr. Burgin expects to lay hand on the violin-concerto. "The Exorcism of the Seven" was likewise discovered somewhere and brought out by Koussevitzky last summer in Paris. Its success was enormous. The amount of critical attention given it was exceeded only by that bestowed upon Stravinsky's piano-concerto. Stravinsky, of course, is a mature musical mind; and he enjoys perhaps the greatest prestige of any living composer. It is not to be pretended that Prokofiev can outshine him; for they are, indeed, not even rivals. They are, rather, co-workers in a national tradition. They are perhaps the only masters now auditing in that tradition because Rakhmaninoff never was a great composer, and Glazunoff is apparently become a fossil. V. T.

From the Oldest of All the Russias

Serge Prokofiev

Born in Ancient Scythia, He Celebrates Its Tribal Gods at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Aftermath

THOUGH those there be who wring their hands and weep, the word, Leningrad (which happens to be the name of the second city in Russia), will stand upon the program-books at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. Thereafter, if common report runs truly, the learned and witty annotator will designate Peter's capital as Petersburg, alias St. Petersburg, alias Petrograd, alias Leningrad; while bystanders watch impishly as our American Tsarists and our American Bolshevists make their choice. Blessings on them both! They would not be half themselves as contributors to the general gayety and to the sum-total of human folly, did they not, as often as need be, go off at half-cock. Our Tsarist neighbor descried the Macchiavellian hand of Mr. Koussevitzky in the use of the impious word; whereas that innocent gentleman and hard-working musician, accustomed to the freedom of Paris and London and to the tolerances of men and women of the world, may only wonder, say with a shade of amusement, what the fuss was all about.

Per contra, over the way in New York, Mr. Franklin P. Adams of The World, solemnly, comically and ignorantly, "directs his indignation toward those officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who objected to the use of the word Leningrad, on the programs." As the merest matter of passing detail, no officer or trustee "objected" or thought of "objecting." Like the rest of us, they have been amused, unedified, maybe a little irritated by the late fracas; then passed to those rather more important matters, the day's work and the day's pleasure. "There," said Matthew Arnold, casting a benignant eye on Oxford, "are our young barbarians all at play." And "there," one Trustee may have said to another, as he glanced out of the office-window, "are our elder sentinels at their sport." H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitzky will divide the program between the sharp-edged Symphony in B flat of the Parisian, Roussel, and a miscellany from Wagner and Weber. As d'Indy's Second Symphony—now a semi-classic—was debated in its day so in these later years of grace has Roussel's sharpened tongues and pens. At last we Bostonians may also part company over it. The subsequent miscellany, in which Mr. Koussevitzky should excel, traverses the Overture to "Oberon"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"; the music for the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung."

From the music of four of his own

BOSTON, MASS. HERALD

OCT 23 1924

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

A concerto by C. P. Emanuel Bach will be played at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. This concerto has an interesting history. As a quintet it was performed by The Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. The quintet of strings was composed of violon quinton, viola d'amore, viol da gamba and bass viol. Mr. Koussewitzky was at the concert and was so pleased by the music that he obtained the composition and purposed to orchestrate it, but he finally handed it to Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. The manuscript is in the Charles Guillon collection at Bourg-en-Bresse, France.

The Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" is supposed to portray the coming of dawn. The scene is the Red Square in the Kremlin. The story is about the struggle between Old Russia and New Russia at the end of the 17th century. Rimsky-Korsakov revised and orchestrated this posthumous work. The Russian Symphony Society in New York performed the Prelude 19 years ago.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" is practically a Scherzo (with voice parts) in his fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." The stage direction is: "Out of the sea a bumble-bee rises and encircles the swan."

We are told that Prokoviev wishes his name to be spelled, since he has been away from Russia, Prokofieff. His "Scythian" suite, as the pieces just mentioned, will be played here for the first time. It is said to be wild and barbaric. The movements are entitled the Adoration of Veles and Ala; the Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits; Night; the Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun. The names of the Scythian gods that appear in Prokofieff's program are far from being those figuring in Herodotus. The Suite, produced at Leningrad in 1916, was played for the first time in this country at Chicago in 1918.

The symphony this week will be Brahms's, No. 4, E minor.

Amusements

1162

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI,
OHIO
STAR
OCT 24 1924

Oct 24-25-26 after

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WILL STIR NEW YORK

Serge Koussevitsky Has Aroused Bostonians, and Promises to Disturb the Figures on the Pedestals of Metropolitan Acclaim—He Will Make His First New York Appearance on Thanksgiving Night.

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, October 24.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony programme and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

Alma Gluck Returns

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
OCT 25 1924

31

Koussevitzky Plays Russian Music

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach
Concerto for orchestra in D major
Moussorgsky
Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakoff....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan" Prokofieff .....Scythian Suite, op. 20
Brahms
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, op. 98.

For the third time Mr. Koussevitzky chose for his opening piece music from the eighteenth century, late eighteenth century to be sure, but music cast more or less in the same mold as that of Vivaldi and Handel, which was heard in the two preceding concerts. Does he choose to commence his programs with such music in order that his hearers may be put in a comfortable and contented frame of thought for the ultra-modern music which is to follow? In any case, it makes an agreeable beginning.

Yesterday afternoon there were other sugar plums as well. Moussorgsky's Prelude is pleasant, agreeable music, but mildly Russian in character, while Rimsky's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" is a clever jeu d'esprit, which is bound to become a favorite with the patrons of the "Pops." It was none the less welcome at a symphony concert, however, and somewhat relieved the austerity of the function.

Then for those who enjoy music of more familiar and conventional pattern there was the E minor Symphony of Brahms. But, alas! those who are enamored of its beauties were obliged to sit through Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, which must have proved a severe trial to some. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky has so won the hearts of his public that even this example of extreme modernity was received with an unusual amount of applause.

This is as it should be. Mr. Monteux was not unaware of the moderns, but such music when played by him was seemingly regarded with suspicion and distrust, and only with the performances of "The Rite of Spring" did his audiences show that enthusiasm which they undoubtedly ought to feel in the presence of music of this present day and generation. For although admiration and appreciation of the past is due and proper, yet it is never well to forget that the art of music did not cease to progress with Brahms and that a hearing must be given to those who now are endeavoring to search out the beautiful, albeit in new and often strange and disquieting ways. All praise then, to Mr. Koussevitzky, who has the courage and conviction to disregard the traditions of over 40 years and successfully to impose those convictions on a public which we fear has long been sadly in need of an awakening.

Again did Mr. Koussevitzky prove his artistic sincerity yesterday afternoon. That his interpretations of whatever music he may undertake are the result of long and careful consideration cannot be denied. That they are of engrossing interest is no less true. Whether or not they always agree with the mood of the music itself is not always certain.

His reading of the E minor Symphony, for example, was to our way of thinking replete with poetry and imagination, but we very much doubt if such an interpretation would have pleased or gratified the composer. For once the music seemed to lose that bleakness which has always been associated with it for us and became expressive and living. But was this not rather the mood of Koussevitzky than of Brahms? Be that as it may, it was none the less a delightful change from the more accepted readings of this symphony.

Prokofieff's Scythian Suite is but mildly exciting. Stravinsky has said these things so much more eloquently in his "Rite of Spring." There is perhaps no objection to two or more different themes played simultaneously in as many different tonalities, but it is of prime importance that these several themes be of striking character. Not so with the thematic material of this suite. We venture to say that any one of them heard by itself is but ordinary stuff. They are mere melodic fragments, of little distinction and capable of but little development. At least they receive but little at the hands of the composer, who conceals the poverty of his invention by harmonic and orchestral effects which arrest the attention for an instant by reason of their strangeness alone. There is a vast difference between the unusual and the original, in music at least.

S. M.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 25 1924

Koussevitzky.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in Elmwood Music hall, November 13 under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. It is Koussevitzky's aim, he says, to present music which now exists only in manuscript; music written by men now living, who, if we may believe Koussevitzky, will rank high a century from now.

But it is not alone for Koussevitzky's introduction of new composers that the public has stormed the doors of the Theater Nationale de l'Opera, Paris, for all his concerts. His interpretations of the old masters have been equally impressive and America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present fine readings of the classics.

One of Koussevitzky's chief interests, however, is the discovery and performance of new music. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabine. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his work The conductor was the first to perform Scriabine's "Prometheus" poem.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans. In the old world he has become known as a searcher for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to find it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
OCT 25 1924

DAMROSCH TO OPEN SEASON NEXT WEEK

Orchestra to Play a "Locomotive Symphony"—McCormack and Other Singers.

Walter Damrosch will open his season with the New York Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Friday evening. After some indecision he has added to this first programme Arthur Honegger's now considerably talked about symphonic movement about a locomotive, "Pacific 231." This was first played by the Russian, Koussevitzky, with his orchestra in Paris and was introduced to America at the first concert of the Boston Orchestra a couple of weeks ago as part of Koussevitzky's introduction of himself as the band's new conductor. In a way, it has become identified with him, but as the first concert in New York of the Boston Orchestra does not take place until the end of next month, Mr. Damrosch has the bulge on the first local performance of the piece.

Besides, the Honegger "Pacific 231," which lasts only six or seven minutes, Mr. Damrosch's programme will include Beethoven's C minor symphony, a first performance of Bernardo Molinari's Orchestration of Debussy's "L'Isle joyeuse," Ralph Vaughn-William's "Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis" and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar."

There will be three concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra next week. Wednesday evening will be the first of the series of programmes for students at reduced prices, this one consisting of the "Eroica" symphony, Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," Maurice Ravel's "Ma mere Poie" suite and the "Euryanthe" overture.

At the pair of subscription concerts on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Mr. van Hoogstraten will introduce a suite by Florent Schmitt, "Antoine et Cleopatra." Otherwise there is to be played Schubert's "Rosamunde" music and the Brahms B flat minor piano concerto with Elly Ney (who is Mrs. van Hoogstraten) as the soloist.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
OCT 25 1924

GREAT CONDUCTOR IS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

"What I hope to do in America is to show the publiv that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in Elmwood Music hall, November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca. It is Koussevitzky's aim, he says, to present music which now exists only in manuscripts in his own keeping; music written by men now living, who if we may believe Koussevitzky, will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of the music to which he refers has been given in Paris and music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for Koussevitzky's introduction of new composers that the public has stormed the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts. His interpretations of the old masters have been equally impressive and America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

CINCINNATI,
OHIO
BILLBOARD
OCT 25 1924

Koussevitzky and Reisman

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, visited the Hotel Brunswick recently, and heard the Leo F. Reisman Orchestra, accredited by many with being originator of the soft style of jazz music. He was loud in his praise and applause of this aggregation's playing, it is said, clapping and calling "Bravo!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 25 1924

This indignation was directed toward Koussevitzky, whom they thought had insisted on "Leningrad" as the name of the capital city of his native land, and who some accused of using the sacred programs of the Boston Symphony to air his political views.—Boston Post.

Indignation hereby is directed toward those officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra who have objected to the use of the name Leningrad on the programs. Contempt hereby is felt for the Boston Post's English.

Doubtless Mr. Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and the Apollo club, would like the military intelligence division to censor the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra. "If we are pleased to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra," writes Mr. Guild in his Commercial Bulletin, "it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

Possibly they want to make an American patriot of Conductor Koussevitzky. To placate Boston it may be necessary for him to say to his orchestra as he raps with his baton: "Don't play till you see the whites of their eyes."

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
OCT 25 1924

SYMPHONY SEASON HERE WILL BE BRILLIANT

Providence may look forward to a Symphony season of the greatest interest and brilliance for Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has now led three opening series of concerts in the orchestra's own city, has been received with an enthusiasm perhaps unprecedented in the annals of this eminent organization now in its 44th year.

The Providence series will comprise the usual five Tuesday evening concerts in Infantry Hall on the following dates: November 18, December 9, January 20, February 24, and April 21. The soloists will be: Marguerite d'Alvarez, the famous Peruvian contralto; Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, new to America last season; Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, who has probably as just a claim to greatness as any singer of the day; and Paul Kochanski, noted Polish violinist.

Mr. Koussevitzky comes to America from an active season in western Europe and his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris; he has likewise been conducting operas at the Paris Grand Opera, and in Barcelona

BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 25 1924

THE PROLOGUE

News and views of music and musicians.

By MARY M. HOWARD.

True to his announced intention of presenting works from the best of the classic and the modern schools of composition, Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra here on the evening of November 13th, plans to include in his Buffalo programme a symphony by the creator of the immortal nine, and some real Russian novelties. Among these are two Rimsky-Korsakoff works, the second a scherzo from his opera, Tsar Saltan, entitled The Flight of the Bumble Bee. Moussorgsky will be represented by the prelude to his opera, Khovantchina, and an interesting number will be Rachmaninoff's Vocalize, arranged for the orchestra by the composer. The whole programme is one of very great novelty and interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 26 1924

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in Elmwood Music hall, November 13, under local management of Bessie Bellanca. It is Koussevitzky's aim, he says, to present music which now exists only in manuscripts in his own keeping; music writen by men now living, who, if we may believe Koussevitzky, will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of the music to which he refers has been given in Paris and music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

Koussevitzky's chief interest, however, is undoubtedly in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitsky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabine. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his work. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabine's "Prometheus" poem.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Ballanca at the Colonial Flower shop.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER
OCT 26 1924

Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it has been intimated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian diretor of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and they took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association.

WATERBURY
CONN.
HERALD
OCT 26 1924

Freedom of Speech.

The successful threat by a prominent Bostonian that the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might lose his position if Leningrad continued to appear instead of St. Petersburg on the orchestra programs, causes one to ponder just how much weight there is to that clause in the Constitution which says that the right of free speech shall not be denied. If the right is not denied it apparently is encroached upon.

LaFollette followers in Hartford and elsewhere notice an encroachment to the right in that they must obtain a permit from the mayor or chief of police to hold an outdoor meeting, an ordinance which is proper enough except that the two old parties do not observe it and it is not expected of them.

Mark Twain, in his autobiography just published, writes: "I am writing from the grave. On these terms only can a man be approximately frank."

The New York World book reviewer criticizes Mr. Clemens for this attitude and recalls that Frank Irving Cobb of The World did not fear to air his opinions freely.

Yet there is much to uphold Mr. Clemens' opinion bolstered by a varied experience in the Western lands of America and in Europe. His bold stand while a resident of Hartford in refusing to vote for James G. Blaine for President showed him that he could not be independent and expect to retain his wide circle of friends. So he gave up the struggle, kept his inmost and most intense thoughts to himself, and waited until he was in the grave before he indulged in freedom of speech.

If the New York World book reviewer thinks Mark Twain should have spoken out freely without fear or favor, let him try putting across some of the ideas that burned in the noted humorist's heart.

Mark Twain was feted and praised and he enjoyed popularity as most people do.

"I am the only person in the sixty millions," he writes from the grave, "—"with congress and the administration back of the sixty millions—who is privileged to construct my patriotism for me."

If he had uttered those words during the late war or even in his own day would he have basked in the sun of popular approval as well as he did, and would his literary ability have saved him from Fort Leavenworth?

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
OCT 26 1924

The advent of Serge Koussevitsky as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of course was a matter of great moment in Boston circles.—over the entire Country, in fact. Koussevitsky chose for his first program on Friday afternoon and Saturday afternoon, October 10 and 11 the following Concerto by Vivaldi, arranged for orchestra by Siloti; Webr's Overture to Oberon, two Wagnerian excerpts, Bacchanale from Tannhauser and the Funeral March from Dusk of the Gods; Honegger's Pacific 231 and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy. The second program on Oct. 17 and 18, included Handel's Concerto Grosso in D Minor, a Dance by Debussy, arranged by Ravel; de Falla's, Love Magic, which will receive its first performance in America, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 26 1924

Soloists for Boston Symphony

Soloists for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here will be Marguerite d'Alvarez, Peruvian contralto; Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, who first came to this country last year; Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who sang with the orchestra last season and will appear with it at the New York concerts, and Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist. The Symphony's season here begins Nov. 18 at Infantry Hall, the other dates being Dec. 9, Jan. 20, Feb. 24 and April 21. It is the 44th season of the orchestra.

Naturally greatest interest will be for the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, whose debut in Boston on Oct. 10 was notable for its brilliancy and enthusiasm. Although now and less familiar works have been and are to be introduced by the new conductor, the classical repertory, it is said, will form the bulk of his programmes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT
CONN.
HERALD
OCT 26 1924

Freedom of Speech.

The successful threat by a prominent Bostonian that the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might lose his position if Leningrad continued to appear instead of St. Petersburg on the orchestra programs, causes one to ponder just how much weight there is to that clause in the Constitution which says that the right of free speech shall not be denied. If the right is not denied it apparently is encroached upon.

LaFollette followers in Hartford and elsewhere notice an encroachment to the right in that they must obtain a permit from the mayor or chief of police to hold an outdoor meeting, an ordinance which is proper enough except that the two old parties do not observe it and it is not expected of them.

Mark Twain, in his autobiography just published, writes: "I am writing from the grave. On these terms only can a man be approximately frank."

The New York World book reviewer criticizes Mr. Clemens for this attitude and recalls that Frank Irving Cobb of The World did not fear to air his opinions freely.

Yet there is much to uphold Mr. Clemens' opinion bolstered by a varied experience in the Western lands of America and in Europe. His bold stand while a resident of Hartford in refusing to vote for James G. Blaine for President showed him that he could not be independent and expect to retain his wide circle of friends. So he gave up the struggle, kept his inmost and most intense thoughts to himself, and waited until he was in the grave before he indulged in freedom of speech.

If the New York World book reviewer thinks Mark Twain should have spoken out freely without fear or favor, let him try putting across some of the ideas that burned in the noted humorist's heart.

Mark Twain was feted and praised and he enjoyed popularity as most people do.

"I am the only person in the sixty millions," he writes from the grave, "—"with congress and the administration back of the sixty millions—who is privileged to construct my patriotism for me."

If he had uttered those words during the late war or even in his own day would he have basked in the sun of popular approval as well as he did, and would his literary ability have saved him from Fort Leavenworth?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 26 1924

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in Elmwood Music hall on November 13th, under local management of Bessie Bellanca. It is Koussevitzky's aim to present music which now exists only in manuscripts in his own keeping, music written by men now living, who, if we may believe Koussevitzky, will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of the music to which he refers has been given in Paris and music lovers in the French capital are wildly enthusiastic over the Russian leader. But it is not alone for Koussevitzky's introduction of new composers that the public stormed the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for his concerts. His interpretations of the old masters have been equally impressive and America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of older classics, without a trace of moderninty in his reading of them. Koussevitzky's chief interest, however, lies in the discovery and performance of new music. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand. Koussevitzky was the discoverer and patron of Scriabine, whose Prometheus poem he was first to perform. I will do in the new world what I have done in the old world," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans. In the old world he has become known as a hunter of musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
OCT 26 1924

Presenting New Works.

In Boston Serge Koussevitzky is continuing his policy of presenting at least one contemporary work at each Boston Symphony concert. For his third pair of concerts a largely Russian program was announced—Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse", Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina", Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee", Prokofieff's Scythian Suite and Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

144

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 26 1924

New York, Oct. 18.

All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big authoritative sweep and the men like it.

PIERRE V. R. KEY

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens, he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make

FOR Boston
Koussevitzky Symphony
APPEARED IN THE PAPERS CHECKED ISSUED OF OCT

☐ The Forward
☐ Jewish Morning Journal
☑ The Day
☐ Jewish Daily News
☐ Freiheit

א נלי-זמר׳ס זוהן וואָס איז ווערט-בארימט

וועגען סערגעי קוסעוויצקי, דער דיריגענט פון דער באסטאן סימפאני. — קאָרעספאנדענץ פון באסטאן — פון ב. מאזעס

אין באסטאן איז איצט סערגעי קוסעוויצקי, דער נייער דיריגענט פון דער סימפאני, די סענסאציע פון טאג. און ניט נאר אין באסטאן, די נאנצע מוזיקאלישע אמעריקע איז איצט שטארק פאראינטערעסירט אין דעם דיריגענט, וואס איז באריהמט איבער נאנץ אייראפא און וועגען וועמען עס זיינען נעשאפען נעווארען לעגענדעס. דא איז אבער ביי זיין ערשטען אויפטרים פאר נעקומען א שטיקעל פאליטישער סקאנדאל. אימיצער האט אויף דער פראגראם איבערגעביטען דעם אלטען נאמען פע־טערבורג ניט אויף פעטראָגראד, נאר אויף לענינגראד. אייניג אריסטאקראטישע אנטי־באלשעוויקעם האבען באשולדיגט דעם נייעם דיריגענט אין דעם. זיי האבען איהם חושד נעווען אין באל־שעוויסטישע נייגונגען. ערשט וועו עס האט זיך ארויסגעוויזען, אז דער נרויסער מוזיקער איז אין דעם פאל ניט שולדיג, און אז ער אליין איז נאר א הייסער אנ־טי־באלשעוויק, האט זיך דער מומעל אויסגעשטעלט.

די „באסטאן סימפאני", ווי באקאנט, איז באריהמט איבער נאנץ אמעריקע. איהר גוטען נאמען האט זי צו פארדאנ־קען די נרויסע דיריגענטען וואס האָ־בען איהר ארקעסטער נעבראכט צו דער מדרגה פון איינעם פון די בעסטע סימ־פאניש ארקעסטערס אין אמעריקע. דר. קארל מוק, דער נרויסער דייטשער מוזי־קער, האט דערפיהרט די באסטאן סימ־פאני כמעט צו פולקאמענהייט. וועו אמעריקע איז אריין אין דער וועלט־מלחמה האט דר. מוק נעמוזט, זייענדיג א דייטשער בירגער, פארלאזען דאס לאנד, און די סימפאניע איז נעבליבען אהן איהר נרויסען פיהרער.

פיער מאנטאו איז דאן נעבראכט נעווארען פון פאריז צו דיריזשירען די באסטאנער סימפאני. מר. מאנטאו איז אפנעשטאנען פינף יאהר מיט דער סימ־פאניע. דורך דער צייט איז עקזיס־טענץ פון דער סימפאניע שיער נעשטעלט נעווארען אין נעפאהר. דאס איז נעווען דאן, וען א נרויסע צאהל מוזיקער, אינ־נער דער פיהרערשאפט פון דעם קאנ־צערט - מייסטער פראדקין, הא־בען ערקלערט א סטרייק. עס האט נע־קעסטער זאל צעפאלען אדער אמווייניג־סטען פארקריפעלט ווערען. מאנטאו איז אבער פון דעם קריזיס ארויסנעקומען בשלום, אוז לעצטען סעזאן, ווען ער האט רעזיגנירט, האט ער איבערנעלאזט א דיסציפלינירטען ערשט־קלאסינען אר־קעסטער.

מיט דעם נייעם דיריגענט קוסע־ווייצקי'ס אנקומען איז אויגענטליך פאר־בונדען א פיערפאבע סעזאציע: ערש־טענס, איז מר. קוסעוויצקי דער ערשטער יוסישער דיריגענט צו דיריגירען די „באסטאן סימפאני"; צווייטענס, איז קוסעוויצקי „פון אידישער אפשטאמונג", ד. ה. א איד; דריטענס, איז ער א מוזי־קער מיט א נרויסען נאמען אין נאנץ אוי־ראפע, און פערטענס, איז ער א זעהר רייכער מאן — א זעלטענהייט צווישען מוזיקער.

קוסעוויצקי איז קרוב צו 50 יאהר אלט. ער איז געבארען נעווארען אין מוור, רוסלאנד. זיין פאטער איז נעווען א אידישער כלי־זמר, וואס האט נע־שפיעלט אויף א נרויסען, שווערען קאנטראבאס. דער יונגער קוסעוויצקי האט געלערנט א מוזיקאלישע בילדונג אין האט נעענדיגט די פעטערבורנער קאנסערוואטאריע מיט א גאלדענעם מע־דאל. אויף דער עצה פון אנטאן רובינ־שטיין ווערט ער א קאנצערטמייסטער אויף'ן קאנטראבאס, אויף דעם זעלבען אינ־סטרומענט וואס זיין פאטער האט נע־שפיעלט. ער האט נעמאכט א פוראר אין פאריז, בערלין, רוים און לאנדאן, ווען ער האט נעשפיעלט מענדעלסאן'ס פי־דעל־קאנצערטא אויף דעם קאנטראבאס. ער האט אויף נעשאפען אייניגע קאם־פאזיציעס און האט ארויסנעבראכט נייע קלאנגען פון דעם קאנטראבאס.

אויף אייגעם פון זיינע קאנצערטען אין כאסקווע האט זיך פארליבט אין איהם די טאכטער פון דעם מאסקווער מיליאנער מאראזאוו און זי האט מיט איהם נעהיראט. דורך דער הייראט האט מר. קוסעוויצקי נעקראנגן א זעהר נרוי־סען קאפיטאל, וואס האט איהם נעגעבען די מעגליכקייט אויפצוטאן וואונדער אין זיין קונסט. פון נאנץ רוסלאנד האט ער צונויפגעקליבען הונדערט פון די בעסטע מוזיקער, האט זיי אויסגעהאלטען נאנצע צוויי יאהר, און דורך דער צייט האט ער אינגעשטודירט מיט זיי קלאסישע מו־זיק. מיט דעם ארקעסטער האט ער באַ־רייזט נאנץ אייראפע און האט זיך ער־וואַרבען א נאמען אלס נרויסער דירי־גענט. שפעטער האט ער נעדונגען א דאמפער און האט נעריזט מיט זיין ער־קעסטער איבער דער נאנצער לענג פון דער וואלגא, געבענדיג קאנצערטען אין אלע שטעדט וואס ליגען ביי דער וואלגא.

דערנאך האט ער אינגעשטודירט מיט זיין ארקעסטער די ווערק פון די מאדערנע קאמפאזיטארס, ווי מעטנער, סטראווינסקי, סקריאבין און ריכאר־שטראוס, און ער מאכט ווידער אן ער־פאלגרייכען טור איבער אייראפע אלס דיריגענט פון מאדערנער מוזיק. ער האט אויך נענרינדעט אין פעטערבורג א פארלאג ארויסצוגעבען די ווערק פון יונ־גע רוסישע קאמפאזיטארס, וואס איז נעווארען דער צענטער פון דער רוסישער מוזיקאלישער וועלט.

אין 1920 האט ער זיך באזעצט אין פאריז, וואו ער האט דירישירט זייע באריהמטע קאנצערטען, ביז זיין רוהם האט דערגרייכט אויף דער זייט ים. וועו דער באסטאנער סימפאני ארקעסטער האט נעזוכט א נייעם דירינענט, איז ער רעקאמענדירט נעווארען אלס דער בעסטער וואס די סימפאניע קאן זיך ווינשען. קוסעוויצקי האט אננענומען די איינלאדונג און איז נעקומען דירישירען דעם „באסטאן סימפאני" ארקעסטער.

צוזאמען מיט מר. קוסעוויצקי'ן איז נעקומען זיין פרוי נאטאליע און זיין סעק־רעטער דר. וולאדימיר צעדערבוים, אן אייניקעל פון דעם רעדאקטאר פון דער העברעאישער צייטונג „„המליץ" און א קאזין פון מארטאוו'ן, דעם סאציאל־דעמאקראט.

מר. קוסעוויצקי איז שטארק פער־אינטערעסירט אין די נייע אידישע מוזי־קער און קאמפאזיטארס. באזונדערס פאלנט ער נאך די ענטוויקלונג פון דער נרופע אידישע נאציאנאליסטען, וועלכע אלם שילער פון דער פעטערבורנער קאנ־סערוואטאריע, האבען אננעהויבען שא־פען אידישע קאמפאזיציעס. קוסעוויצ־קי ווערט פון מאנכע אידישע קאמפאזיטארס שפיעלען אין דער „באס־טאן סימפאני". ספעציעל די ווערק פון ערנסט בלאך. וועלכער איז איצט דירעק־טאר פון קליוולאנדער קאנסערוואטא־ריע; פון ראזוסקי'ן, דירעקטאר פון רישער קאנסערוואטאריע; פון אהרונ'ען, ווערמען קאסעוויצקי ווי'ל אריבערברייננען קיין אמעריקע; פון אלכסנדר קרעין, וועלכער האט צוזאמען מיט יואל ענגעל נענרינדעט אין ירושלים דעם פארלאג „יבנה" פאר מאדערנער העברעאישער מוזיק, און פון פראנ. באריס מאראס, נרינדער פון יפו'ער קאנסערוואטאריע. אויך די דריטע סימפאניע פון דעם אי־דיש־פראנצויזישען קאמפאזיטאר ער־נעסט לעווי, וועט מר. קוסעוויצקי אויפ־פיהרען.

דער ערשטער קאנצערט אין באסטאן מיט קוסעוויצקי'ן אלס קאנדוקטאר, איז נעווען א נרויסער ערפאלג. די קריטיק האט איהם שטארק נעלויבט, און די אווא־ציע וואס ער האט נעקראנגן איז נעווען זעהר איינדרוקספול.

די „באסטאן סימפאני" ניט 24 קאנ־צערטען פרייטאג בייטאג און 24 קאנ־צערטען שבת אוועגד. אלע טיקעטס ווערען פארקויפט פאראוים פאר דעם נאנצען סעזאן. פאר פרייטאג בייטאג בלויז ווערט די צווייטע באלקאני אוועק־נעגעבען פריי פאר ליעבהאבער פון מוזיק. מען דארף נאר באצאהלען 50 סענט פאר דעם פראגראם־ביכעל און אפשטעהן עט־ליכע שעה אין דער רייה. די באלקאני נעהאמט אריין ארום 500 פערזאן, איז קומען קומען דריי מאל אזוי פיעל. שטעהט מען אפ א פאר שטונדען, און פיעלע האבען הנאה כאטש פון שטעהן אין לאין.

מר. קוסעוויצקי מאכט זעהר א נוטעז אייגדרוק. ער איז פון מיטעלען וואוקס, פעסט נעבוים, נעדיכטע שוואַרצע האר, ערטערווייז שוין באזילבערט. זיינע אוי־גען זיינען פול מיט באגייסטערונג.

אין אייראפע האט מר. קוסעוויצקי נעשטיצט מיט א פרייער האנט אלע נויטבאדערפטינע יונגע קאמפאזיטארס און סטודענטען פון מוזיק. פאר דעם רו־סישען מוזיקאלישען פארלאג האט ער אסיגנירט א האלבען מיליאן רובעל.

דא אין אמעריקע וועט מר. קוסע־ווייצקי שפיעלען די ווערק פון אמערי־קאנער קאמפאזיטארס. באזונדערס האלט ער פון דעם אמעריקאנער קאמפאזיטאר דזשאן אלדען קארפענטער.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

OCT 27 1924

Boston Snubs Leningrad.

When you say Leningrad you are helping to glorify the memory of the late Nikolai Lenin. That's one way of looking at it. If your mail intended to reach the city on the Neva is addressed St. Petersburg or Petrograd, you will get it back, under a recent Soviet ruling. That leads to a second, or practical, point of view.

Leningrad is the official and only name of that fast-decaying city of vivid memories, exactly as Boston is the only name of the city on the Charles whose municipal history is really seventy years older under one name than is Leningrad's under three. Nobody in Revolutionary Boston sought to change its title because it originated in the Lincolnshire town that was then in enemy territory. But Boston is to-day the seat of opposition to using the name Leningrad because distinguished residents refuse to honor a man they hold as an enemy.

Despite the Revolution this country continues to name States Georgia, Virginia and Maryland, after British sovereigns. To come a great deal closer to home, we still have Kings and Queens counties. Despite Indian wars Americans continue to dwell by the Chattahoochee River and Oneida Lake. Despite the Mexican War we still visit El Paso, Palo Alto and San Diego. Despite the war with Germany we adhere to Bismarck, N. D., and enjoy German silver and German measles. To be sure, we have Kings College renamed Columbia, Hamburg avenue renamed Wilson avenue and sauerkraut renamed Liberty cabbage. But these are isolated examples.

The best advice to persons sensitive in such matters is that place names that are historically abhorrent had better be pronounced or read wtih a distinct reservation of reverence. An alternative is Boston's way. Because the use of Leningrad in the Boston Symphony programme was found offensive all mention of that city is to be cut out. Boston is to ignore Leningrad, and when Boston studiously ignores anything it is a snub of extraordinary refrigerating power.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
COMMERCIAL

OCT 27 1924

ations, "Istar" (Judy).

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the usual double series of 5 Thursday evening, and 5 Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: Nov. 27 and 29, Jan. 1 and 3, Jan. 29 and 31, March 12 and 14 and April 9 and 11. The present season is the 44th of this orchestra, and will be the 38th in New York.

The soloists for the New York concerts will include: Roland Hayes in the Thursday evening series; Serge Rachmaninoff in the Saturday evening series and Albert Spalding in each series.

Mr. Koussevitzky comes to America from an active season in western Europe, where he has been giving his annual series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris; he has likewise been conducting operas at the Paris Grand Opera and in Barcelona.

Transcript
Oct 29, 24

Incidents and Prospects

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for Young People, next Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky and the wind and brass choirs will play for the first times in Boston Stravinsky's arrangement of the Song of the Volga Bargemen. It has already been described in this place.

With Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, the Symphony Orchestra will be heard on Thursday evening in the series of concerts at Wellesley College. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; the prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantschina"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherzo of the Bee"; Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; the Suite from de Falla's "Love the Sorcerer," all stand on the program.

Apropos that Scherzo, and the immediate repetition of it at the Symphony Concert last Saturday, Mr. Thomas G. Frothingham, writing to The Transcript, recalls a similar "encore" at the old Music-Hall in Mr. Henschel's distant day as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. The piece —of all pieces!—was Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette!!" H. T. P.

ON BOSTON STAGES

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
OCT 27 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY USING MODERN MEN'S SONGS

Believes Compositions of Present Day Will Live Like Works of Ancient Masters

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in Elmwood Music hall November 13th under local management of Bessie Bellanca. It is Koussevitzky's aim, he says, to present music which now exists only in manuscripts in his own keeping; music written by men now living, who if we may believe Koussevitzky, will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of the music to which he refers has been given in Paris and music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for Koussevitzky's introduction of new composers that the public has stormed the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts. His interpretations of the old masters have been equally impressive and America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

Koussevitzky's chief interest, however, is undoubtedly in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabine. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his work. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabine's "Prometheus" poem.

It may safely be assumed that Koussevitzky will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, 230 Delaware avenue.

Oct. 30

HE BOSTON HERALD, TH

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Last Saturday night at the Symphony concert "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" was repeated, so long-continued was the applause. It has been said that this was the first time an "encore" was granted in the history of the orchestra, except when Mr. Paderewski played, but we are reminded that Mr. Henschel allowed a repetition of Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette."

On Feb. 20 and 21, 1891, Vladimir de Pachmann played Chopin's Concerto in F minor at a subscription concert of the orchestra. So great was the enthusiasm that he came out and, to the amazement of Mr. Nikisch and the conservative, played Liszt's "Rigoletto" fantasie.

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening comprises these compositions, to be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky: Overture to "Oberon," Roussel's Symphony, B flat, the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music, from "Dusk of the Gods," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Roussel's Symphony, in three movements, was produced at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris in March, 1922. Mr. Koussevitzky brought the Symphony out at one of his concerts in Paris in October, 1923. The first movement is intended to express the enthusiastic ardor of youth. The second, fleeting joys, then deep impressions of a sentimental nature; the third, sorrow, bitterness, revolt and at the end the serenity that brings peace and raises man above his passions.

...Sunday afternoon.

The first of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts for young people will take place in Symphony hall next Tuesday at 4 P. M. It will be repeated on Wednesday afternoon at the same hour. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct. Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo and March from "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Stravinsky, Song of the Volga Bargemen (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky, Canzonetta from the violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Rimsky-Korsakov, The Flight of the Bumble Bee; d'Indy, Minuet and French Round Dance from The Old Style Suite in D; Johann Strauss, Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube."

No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

I'm very much afraid.

Oct 31

DID SHE TIP THE CONDUCTOR?

As the World Wags:

Honegger's "Pacific 231," produced here by Mr. Koussevitzky, is an extremely realistic composition. It is supposed to portray an express train thundering along at night. The portrayal succeeded. For at the first swish of steam voiced by the violin 'cellos and stringed basses, the lady in the berth just ahead of mine suddenly awoke, rubbed the sleep from her eyes and began making her toilet. She started with a powder blast; then rouged up a bit, got out the old family comb; in fact, did everything but take a bath. And she had her wraps on when the porter came to carry out her bag as the train slowed down.

C. N. T.

Oct. 30 - next page

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 27 1924

Koussevitzky Tosses Precedent on Scrap Heap and Answers Applause With an Encore

Less than a month's acquaintance with Serge Koussevitzky shows his independence, daring and contempt for tradition and custom. He breaks precedent with suave assurance that wins his younger patrons' admiration. In the music he puts pauses where none is written, whips up the tempo in passages other conductors play at metronomic pace, makes phrases stand out that heretofore were but humble parts of the structure, in fact does about everything differently than his predecessors at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the third concert, Saturday night, he smashed one of the most cherished precedents, a law almost in the spirit in which it has been rigidly observed for 43 years, that prohibiting encores, or repetition. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelieveable virtuosity of the orchestra. The piece was of most intense brilliance and played with the nth degree of elegance and lightness, but all too short.

The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitzky bade the players rise in acknowledgment. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his band. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the handclapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee" was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If some of the older patrons were shocked at the departure they concealed their emotions, for during intermission a short time later the breaking of the time-honored rule was dismissed with the comment, "He gave them what they asked for."

In all probability the trustees' mail will be filled today with protests against permitting encores at a symphony concert, but there is little likelihood of anything coming from it for there is another precedent as old as the non-encore one, and that is the one constituting the conductor the power absolute over concerts, in never interfering with him.

The only soloist for whom the no-encore rule could be said to have been suspended was Paderewski, but at Pension Fund Concerts the concerto played by him with the orchestra was put at the end of the programme and he would return and play piece after piece alone when both audience and orchestra settled back for an hour of real enjoyment, for there was no formality about the extra pieces, he going from etudes to waltzes and sonatas through the Chopin list.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 27 1924

More Symphony Concerts

The program-book at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon announced the five supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, renewed for a third season. They will fall on Monday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 30 and April 27. At all five, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct. At each concert, besides, there will be an "assisting artist": Miss Dusolina Gianinni, the newly risen singer; Mr. Münz for young, and Miss Hess for mature, pianist; Mr. John Charles Thomas, the baritone, passed from operetta to the concert-hall; and from the orchestra itself, Mr. Burgin the violinist. As heretofore the programs will cultivate the usual rather than the unusual in symphonic music. The considerable public, which is eager to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, but which lacks inclination, means or place for the regular Symphony Concerts, has now its opportunity. At $7.50 and $9, applications for season-tickets to the "Five Mondays" will now be received at Symphony Hall. H. T. P.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 27 1924

A SAMOVAR TEMPEST.

Indignant expostulation as a fine art was worthily exhibited by Courtenay Guild of Boston in his protest against the use of the name Leningrad for Petrograd in the Boston Symphony orchestra's program books. The new conductor of the orchestra is a Russian, and it was hastily inferred that the choice of the new form of the city's name was at his dictation and represented an attempt to render homage to the Bolshevik leader. Had Mr. Guild known that the new conductor was a sufferer from, not an adherent of, the Bolshevik regime, he would have been more cautious in drawing conclusions. Had he reflected that the able editor of the symphony program books, Philip Hale, the well-known critic, possesses a fine regard for scholarly accuracy, he would have seen that such a man was likely to use the legally correct term. That, of course, was all there was to the matter, and Boston has had a fine tempest in a very small teapot.—Springfield Republican.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Time
OCT 27 1924

Koussevitsky Triumphant

Concerts are beginning to lose the careless informality of other days. Neither the performers nor the audience used to bother much about getting to them on time. It used to be long after the appointed hour before the conductor made his initial bow, and long after that before any appreciable portion of those to whom he was supposedly bowing began to trickle in. And it never used to be long before they started to trickle out again. All of which was a circumstance not particularly favorable to the perfect audition of orchestral music.

It is typical of this day of prompter and better music that Serge Koussevitsky, his orchestra and most of his audience were all in Symphony Hall on the occasion of his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But it was due wholly to Mr. Koussevitsky's accomplished and masterful rendering of a program including Berlioz' overture, Roman Carnival, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn and, notably, Honegger's Pacific, 231, that the enthusiastic audience was still there practically en masse at the end of the program.

Honegger's arresting translation into musical terms of the progress of a powerful locomotive hurtling through the night met with a reception almost unprecedented for a modernist composer.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The opening of the seat sale for the concert to be given next Sunday afternoon in the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 musicians, with Serge Koussevitzky, its new Russian leader, conducting, brought a heavy demand for tickets at Steinerts Saturday and this demand will undoubtedly increase as the week wears on. Those intending to enjoy the concert, therefore, are urged to make their reservations early in the week to avoid disappointment.

Here's what the Boston Globe's music critic said of Conductor Koussevitzky the day after he had conducted his first concert in Boston with the Symphony orchestra:

"Serge Koussevitzky will make the Boston Symphony orchestra once more first in the world if the deep impression he made on his first Boston audience yesterday afternoon is any test. Orchestra and audience stood to applaud him at his first entrance. There was vehement applause after every number on a program, which no conductor could have made more vivid. At the end of the concert the orchestra applauded its new leader as fervently as the audience did. In the intermission the throng in the hallways was praising Koussevitzky unstintedly."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
OCT 27 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY USING MODERN MEN'S SONGS

Believes Compositions of Present Day Will Live Like Works of Ancient Masters

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in Elmwood Music hall November 13th under local management of Bessie Bellanca. It is Koussevitzky's aim, he says, to present music which now exists only in manuscripts in his own keeping; music written by men now living, who if we may believe Koussevitzky, will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of the music to which he refers has been given in Paris and music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for Koussevitzky's introduction of new composers that the public has stormed the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts. His interpretations of the old masters have been equally impressive and America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

Koussevitzky's chief interest, however, is undoubtedly in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabine. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his work. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabine's "Prometheus" poem.

It may safely be assumed that Koussevitzky will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, 230 Delaware avenue.

Oct. 30

HE BOSTON HERALD, TH

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Last Saturday night at the Symphony concert "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" was repeated, so long-continued was the applause. It has been said that this was the first time an "encore" was granted in the history of the orchestra, except when Mr. Paderewski played, but we are reminded that Mr. Henschel allowed a repetition of Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette."

On Feb. 20 and 21, 1891, Vladimir de Pachmann played Chopin's Concerto in F minor at a subscription concert of the orchestra. So great was the enthusiasm that he came out and, to the amazement of Mr. Nikisch and the conservative, played Liszt's "Rigoletto" fantasie.

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening comprises these compositions, to be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky: Overture to "Oberon," Roussel's Symphony, B flat, the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music, from "Dusk of the Gods," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Roussel's Symphony, in three movements, was produced at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris in March, 1922. Mr. Koussevitzky brought the Symphony out at one of his concerts in Paris in October, 1923. The first movement is intended to express the enthusiastic ardor of youth. The second, fleeting joys, then deep impressions of a sentimental nature; the third, sorrow, bitterness, revolt and at the end the serenity that brings peace and raises man above his passions.

[illegible] Sunday afternoon.

The first of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts for young people will take place in Symphony hall next Tuesday at 4 P. M. It will be repeated on Wednesday afternoon at the same hour. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct. Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo and March from "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Stravinsky, Song of the Volga Bargemen (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky, Canzonetta from the violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Rimsky-Korsakov, The Flight of the Bumble Bee; d'Indy, Minuet and French Round Dance from The Old Style Suite in D; Johann Strauss, Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube."

No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

I'm very much afraid.

DID SHE TIP THE CONDUCTOR?

As the World Wags:

Honegger's "Pacific 231," produced here by Mr. Koussevitzky, is an extremely realistic composition. It is supposed to portray an express train thundering along at night. The portrayal succeeded. For at the first swish of steam voiced by the violin 'cellos and stringed basses, the lady in the berth just ahead of mine suddenly awoke, rubbed the sleep from her eyes and began making her toilet. She started with a powder blast; then rouged up a bit, got out the old family comb; in fact, did everything but take a bath. And she had her wraps on when the porter came to carry out her bag as the train slowed down.

C. N. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 27 1924

165

Koussevitzky Tosses Precedent on Scrap Heap and Answers Applause With an Encore

Less than a month's acquaintance with Serge Koussevitzky shows his independence, daring and contempt for tradition and custom. He breaks precedent with suave assurance that wins his younger patrons' admiration. In the music he puts pauses where none is written, whips up the tempo in passages other conductors play at metronomic pace, makes phrases stand out that heretofore were but humble parts of the structure, in fact does about everything differently than his predecessors at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the third concert, Saturday night, he smashed one of the most cherished precedents, a law almost in the spirit in which it has been rigidly observed for 43 years, that prohibiting encores, or repetition. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelieveable virtuosity of the orchestra. The piece was of most intense brilliance and played with the nth degree of elegance and lightness, but all too short.

The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitzky bade the players rise in acknowledgment. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his band. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the handclapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee" was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If some of the older patrons were shocked at the departure they concealed their emotions, for during intermission a short time later the breaking of the time-honored rule was dismissed with the comment, "He gave them what they asked for."

In all probability the trustees' mail will be filled today with protests against permitting encores at a symphony concert, but there is little likelihood of anything coming from it for there is another precedent as old as the non-encore one, and that is the one constituting the conductor the power absolute over concerts, in never interfering with him.

The only soloist for whom the no-encore rule could be said to have been suspended was Paderewski, but at Pension Fund Concerts the concerto played by him with the orchestra was put at the end of the programme and he would return and play piece after piece alone when both audience and orchestra settled back for an hour of real enjoyment, for there was no formality about the extra pieces, he going from etudes to waltzes and sonatas through the Chopin list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
OCT 27 1924

Koussevitsky Triumphant

Concerts are beginning to lose the careless informality of other days. Neither the performers nor the audience used to bother much about getting to them on time. It used to be long after the appointed hour before the conductor made his initial bow, and long after that before any appreciable portion of those to whom he was supposedly bowing began to trickle in. And it never used to be long before they started to trickle out again. All of which was a circumstance not particularly favorable to the perfect audition of orchestral music.

It is typical of this day of prompter and better music that Serge Koussevitsky, his orchestra and most of his audience were all in Symphony Hall on the occasion of his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But it was due wholly to Mr. Koussevitsky's accomplished and masterful rendering of a program including Berlioz' overture, Roman Carnival, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn and, notably, Honegger's Pacific, 231, that the enthusiastic audience was still there practically en masse at the end of the program.

Honegger's arresting translation into musical terms of the progress of a powerful locomotive hurtling through the night met with a reception almost unprecedented for a modernist composer.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 27 1924

More Symphony Concerts

The program-book at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon announced the five supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, renewed for a third season. They will fall on Monday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 30 and April 27. At all five, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct. At each concert, besides, there will be an "assisting artist": Miss Dusolina Gianinni, the newly risen singer; Mr. Münz for young, and Miss Hess for mature, pianist; Mr. John Charles Thomas, the baritone, passed from operetta to the concert-hall; and from the orchestra itself, Mr. Burgin the violinist. As heretofore the programs will cultivate the usual rather than the unusual in symphonic music. The considerable public, which is eager to hear Mr. Koussevitzky, but which lacks inclination, means or place for the regular Symphony Concerts, has now its opportunity. At $7.50 and $9, applications for season-tickets to the "Five Mondays" will now be received at Symphony Hall.

H. T. P.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 27 1924

A SAMOVAR TEMPEST.

Indignant expostulation as a fine art was worthily exhibited by Courtenay Guild of Boston in his protest against the use of the name Leningrad for Petrograd in the Boston Symphony orchestra's program books. The new conductor of the orchestra is a Russian, and it was hastily inferred that the choice of the new form of the city's name was at his dictation and represented an attempt to render homage to the Bolshevik leader. Had Mr. Guild known that the new conductor was a sufferer from, not an adherent of, the Bolshevik regime, he would have been more cautious in drawing conclusions. Had he reflected that the able editor of the symphony program books, Philip Hale, the well-known critic, possesses a fine regard for scholarly accuracy, he would have seen that such a man was likely to use the legally correct term. That, of course, was all there was to the matter, and Boston has had a fine tempest in a very small teapot.—Springfield Republican.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The opening of the seat sale for the concert to be given next Sunday afternoon in the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 musicians, with Serge Koussevitzky, its new Russian leader, conducting, brought a heavy demand for tickets at Steinerts Saturday and this demand will undoubtedly increase as the week wears on. Those intending to enjoy the concert, therefore, are urged to make their reservations early in the week to avoid disappointment.

Here's what the Boston Globe's music critic said of Conductor Koussevitzky the day after he had conducted his first concert in Boston with the Symphony orchestra:

"Serge Koussevitzky will make the Boston Symphony orchestra once more first in the world, if the deep impression he made on his first Boston audience yesterday afternoon is any test. Orchestra and audience stood to applaud him at his first entrance. There was vehement applause after every number on a program, which no conductor could have made more vivid. At the end of the concert the orchestra applauded its new leader as fervently as the audience did. In the intermission the throng in the hallways was praising Koussevitzky unstintedly."

Tomorrow's Symphony — Current Stages

MUSIC FOR PRAISE, MUSIC FOR BLAME, MUSIC FOR DEBATE

ROUSSEL'S SYMPHONY IN FIRST HEARING

Mr. Koussevitzky Introduces a Much-Mooted Parisian Piece—The Composer and His Background—Purpose and Procedure as He Outlines Them—Harmonic Intricacies, Recurring Dissonance

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky will not spare his hearers. He will lay before them the Symphony in B-flat major of Albert Roussel—first heard and ignored at the Pasdeloup Concerts in Paris in 1922; repeated in 1923 at the "Concerts Koussevitzky"; thereafter praised, blamed, scrutinized and debated; now to be played for the first times in America. With the ballet, "Padmâvâti," the Symphony is the crown, thus far, of Roussel's music; while in the composer himself converge the main streams of modern French music. As an ensign in the Navy, he travelled in his youth to Indo-China; and like Félicien David, Bizet, Lalo, Saint-Saëns, Ravel, and of late Roland-Manuel, Delage and Milhaud, he has responded to that call of the exotic which so many French artists have answered in passionate imagination—Paul Gauguin in painting, Claude Farrère and Pierre Loti in letters. His second voyage to the East, this time as a civilian, generated the three "Evocations" for orchestra (there is also a chorus in the third), and the ballet-opera "Padmâvâti." The heritage of Debussyan nature-worship (and this heritage includes both the sentiment and the technique of expression) produced in Roussel "The Poem of the Forest," a symphony in four movements; "The Spider's Feast," a ballet; and an orchestral "Prelude for a Celebration of the Spring.' Roussel's incorrigible Gallicism, the Gallicism of Couperin and Lully, has produced such pieces of delicate chamber-music as the Suite and the Sonatine for piano and the Divertissement for wind instruments. Finally the pedagogical tradition of the Schola Cantorum, where Roussel studied for nine years under d'Indy and taught for nearly as many more—the tradition of high seriousness and sustained form, the tradition of Franck—has produced in 1907 the Sonata for Violin and Piano, and in 1921 the Symphony in B-flat.

In spite of these antecedents, perhaps because of them, the music of Albert Roussel is not like that of any other composer. Even the Six, jealous of all skill and erudition, have been sufficiently impressed by his independent "modernity" to give it official recognition at the "Concerts Wiéner." The music of Florent Schmitt is of equally varied ancestry, but is imitative. Sometimes Debussy, sometimes Wagner, sometimes Stravinsky, and not seldom a composer of frankly inferior flamo, has fired the engines of that musical steam-roller. Schmitt's power, though considerable, is never his own; whereas, the most unfriendly critic does not deny to Roussel the integrity of a highly personal and independent expression.

The Symphony in B-flat was first played at a Pasdeloup Concert in 1922. It was a failure. No publisher would touch it. In 1923 Roland-Manuel brought the manuscript to Mr. Koussevitzsky. That conductor, long an admirer of Roussel's music, was much impressed. He gave it a performance, and the piece was redeemed. Since that fortunate day, it has been extolled, defamed, and studied more than any symphony since d'Indy's Second. In fact, whether the listener likes it or not, it is probably, after Chausson's Symphony in B-flat minor and d'Indy's in B-flat, the third great monument to the tradition of Franck. Roussel himself gave to Professor Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard the following analysis of the music:

This symphony is divided into three parts, of which the identity with the divisions of the classic symphony may be established thus:

First Part—Introduction and Allegro.
Second Part—Scherzo.
Third Part—Adagio and Finale.

Aside from this introduction, which is only a sort of preface, the different ideas presented in the course of the Symphony are intended to express, in the first movement, the enthusiastic and confident ardor of youth en route toward life; in the second movement, the light joys and the deeper feelings which youth discovers there; in the third, the bitterness of grief and revolt, and, finally, repose in the serenity which lifts man above his passions.

The slow introduction, after a dozen measures for the bassoons, presents a theme of grave character which is stated twice, and which, in its quasi-immobility around the tonic, has an aspect of fixity and immutability. The introduction presents also the beginning of a popular theme which will not appear in all its force till the end of the last movement.

The Allegro, which follows, is based on two ideas very different from each other. The first is rather supple and sketchy in design; the second, strongly rhythmic. The principal motiv, after an excited preparation, bursts forth from the horns and violas in the key of F-sharp major; then from the basses in E-flat. The development is interrupted by a reminiscence of the introduction and by the appearance of a third idea, calm and peaceful in mood, which the wood-winds sing over an obstinate rhythm in the basses. The recapitulation brings back the second theme, and then the first, beneath which is heard, toward the close, the grave theme of the introduction.

The Scherzo begins with a rather light phrase for the violins in six-eight time against different rhythms for the flutes and bassoons. The middle section is occupied by a sort of nocturne, a melody for the violas which, taken up by the violins, becomes expressive and impassioned. The rhythm of the beginning reappears, and the phrase which the first violins had originally expressed is now stated in three-eight time, first by the flute alone and then by the strings, but completely without its rhythmic character, while an alert trumpet recalls the rhythmic idea of the preceding Allegro. An animated coda ends this second movement.

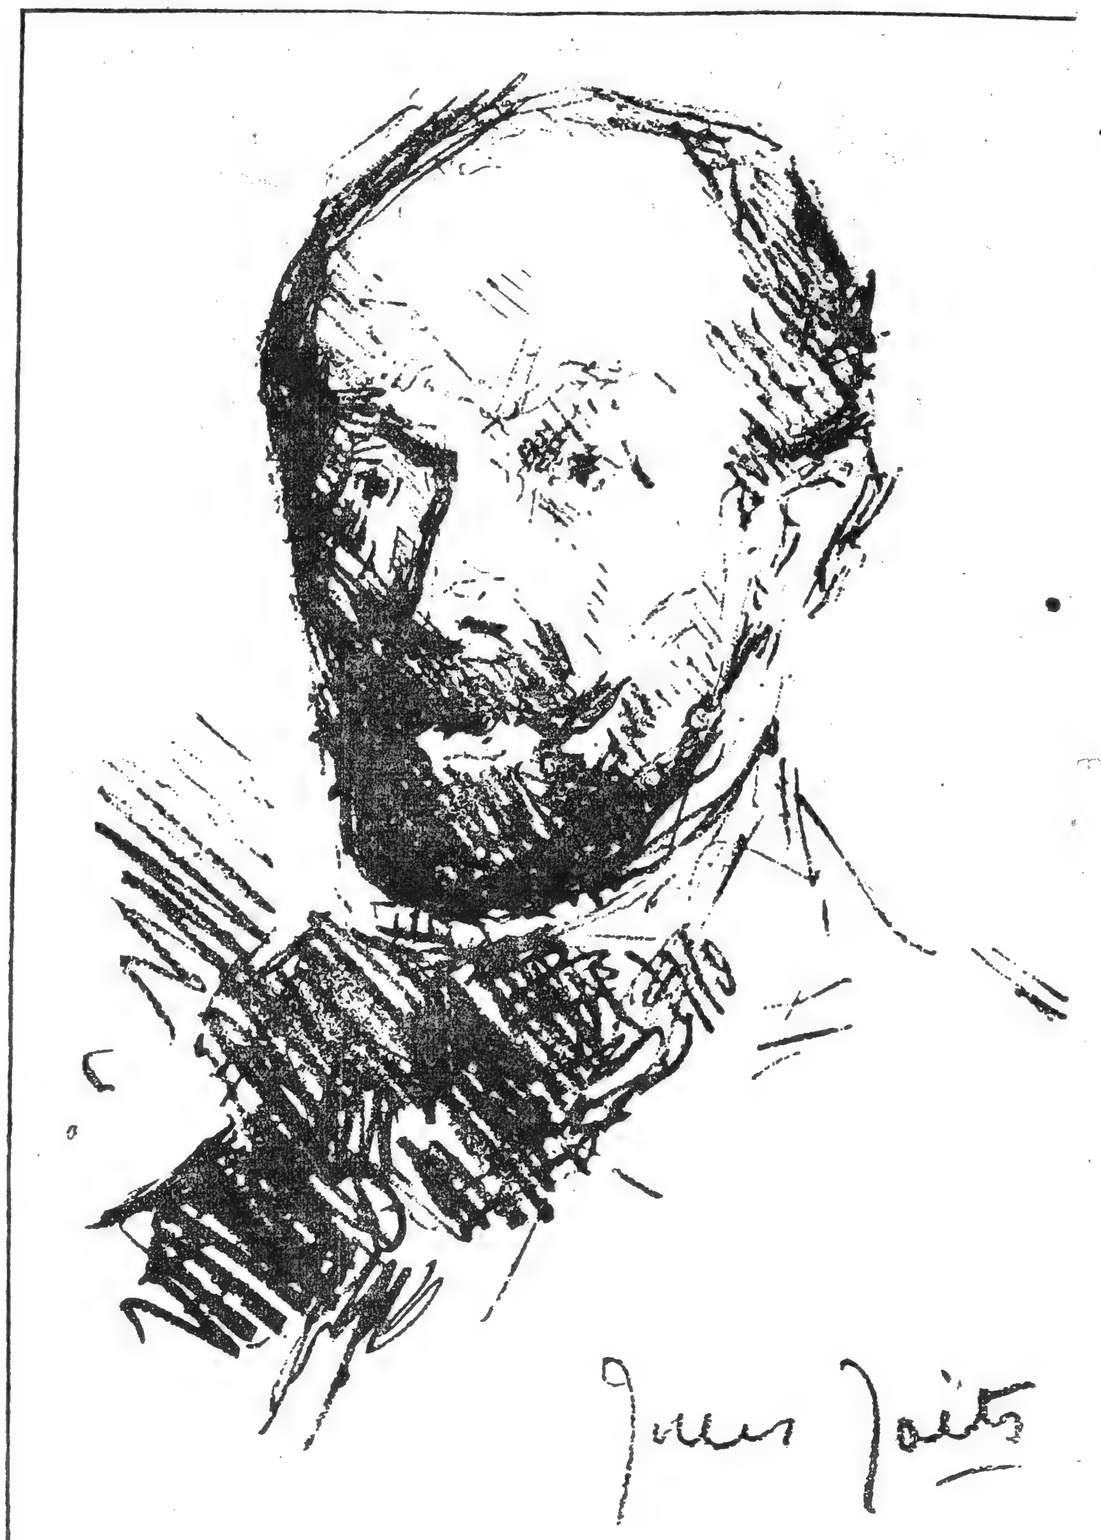
The Adagio, with which the last movement opens, includes a slow and mournful theme, stated twice from the strings, and a new intervention of the popular theme originally heard in the introduction. A brutal interruption by the basses brings in an agitated and violent Finale; while heavy and tumultuous orchestral thrusts prepare little by little the march rhythm on which will expand the popular theme which has just appeared. In a brief vision we glimpse the calm motiv which constituted the third idea of the Allegro. But the violent rhythm returns, more aggressive and more brutal, to attain at last its height of intensity and power. A rather long coda brings back in a serene mood the calm phrase beneath which the basses sound once more the grave theme of the introduction.

Once visible through the rather baffling harmonic style, Roussel's Symphony emerges as a solid, simple, soundly proportioned piece of musical architecture. Omitting the long preface, which after all belongs more to the entire piece than to the first section, that movement is seen to be chiefly a development of the second idea—a fine symphonic theme of unmistakable rhythm. The Finale is a glorification of the so-called popular theme. There is very little cyclical treatment of motivs; that is, one does not grow out of another or out of any generative phrase, as in Franck's and d'Indy's Symphonies. Roussel's ideas are independent, and the logic of the music is their interaction and contrast.

The harmony is predominantly bitonal. There is a ground plan of tonality which is fundamental and unmistakable; but above and around this are heard contrasting harmonies and even contrasting tonalities which lend to the main scheme the sonority of a rich dissonance. An example of this contrasted harmony which is especially apt is the return of the scherzo-theme. The tune is fluid and sinuous. To state it with its so-called "normal" harmony would destroy its fluidity by damming it at the cadences. To state it alone would be useless (besides being thin) because the mind would merely add the harmonies of habit and expectation. Actually the harmony (F-sharp major, Dorian mode) combines tonic and dominant in such a way that the entire scale is kept in the mind, and the tune is allowed to move over it at will—and all this in thin score without any heaviness. When contrasting tonalities occur, as in the first appearance of the "popular theme," they serve to throw the theme and its own tonality into sharp relief. Once in the last movement two keys are used to neutralize each other in the bass for an effect of vague expectancy. The system of modulation is predominantly toward the sub-mediants and the half-octave (the augmented fourth above or below the tonic). The true dominant, F, is heard before the final tonic at the end of the first and the last movements.

The orchestration is delicate, precise and poetic. Roussel's long devotion to the exotic has developed a technique both harmonic and orchestral that is admirably suited to achieve a subtle and pungent style, while his scholarly integrity has preserved him in the Symphony from the use of technique for any but musical ends. . . . Roussel has long been known as a composer of imagination and taste. He has never written badly or hastily. The Symphony in B-flat, along with the ballet-opera "Padmâvâti," is the utterance of a rich maturity; and if it seems confusing or discordant, we had better go listen again. And yet again. V. T.

Sketched in the Manner of His Music



Albert Roussel

Begetter of the Most Remarkable French Symphony Since d'Indy's Prime

From a Drawing in a Parisian Paper

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL
OCT 28 1924

Arthur Honegger's railroad music, "Pacific 231," played by the Chicago Symphony orchestra week before last, can not be called either his best music, or the most satisfying of the novelties Frederick Stock has chosen for Chicago performance. It was a most interesting work to hear, however, and other cities are to experience it this winter.

Boston has already heard it under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Rudolph Ganz will conduct the St. Louis orchestra's performances of the short work and the Cleveland orchestra will also play it under the leadership of Nikolai Sokoloff. If one of the practically countless conductors of the several New York orchestras do not play "Pacific 231," the omission will be worthy of an explanation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 28 1924

HENSCHEL GAVE ENCHORE

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—In reference to the comment in the Post as to the repetition of "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" at the Symphony concert last Saturday, it is true that there has been a tradition against repeating numbers in the programme at these concerts. But the writer was present at Music Hall when an exactly similar incident occurred under Henschel as conductor. In a lighter mood he had included the "Funeral March of a Marionette" on the programme of a Saturday night concert.

The staid audience was so moved by the charm of this piece rendered by the Symphony Orchestra that the concert was held up by wild applause until Henschel at last yielded and repeated the number. So the Marionette and the Bumble Bee were both too lively for tradition, although it was the funeral of the former!

THOMAS G. FROTHINGHAM.

Pizzetti, Miss Ippolito and Mr. Sanroma are indeed promising youth.

And in the perdurable fashion of Berlin Mr. Lamond, the pianist, proffers a Beethoven-Evening," or rather a "Beethoven Matinée," since it is on Saturday afternoon that he will set the wooden walls of Jordan Hall a-ringing. Not a whit does he depart from ancient and honorable precedent. There are the three Sonatas—"Pathetic," "Waldstein," "Appassonata." There also are the prelude and the interludes—the Fantasia in G minor, the Rondo in G major; the Andante Favori. Earnest and unsated will be the audience; serious and insatiable will be the pianist. The [illegible] give them [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 28 1924

Incidents and Prospecst

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and the audience may relatively take their ease. No Prokofiev will spur them; no Roussel tax them. For novel number the conductor proposes Ravel's version for orchestra of Musorgsky's twelve piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." They are impressions in tones, humorous, sardonic, fanciful.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
OCT 29 1924

For Brockton Music Lovers.

Brockton music lovers cannot complain of a dearth of artistic entertainment this winter, thanks at least in part to the various organizations of public spirited men and women who are willing to look first of all at the educational and artistic gains even at the risk of dipping deep into the treasury. And had all those who have had to do with the planning of such affairs contrived to put their heads together for the purpose they could not have made up a more interesting list. Already we have had the great pleasure of listening to Roland Hayes—parenthetically, we have not yet descended from the clouds—on the 31st we hear the Flonzaleys, later we will hear the Boston Symphony orchestra with the increasingly applauded and appreciated Mr. Koussevitzky at its head, and there will be other things of which, more anon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
OCT 29 1924

Kermit Roosevelt tells us that when he was in Soviet Russia—the name of which isn't "Russia" any more—and tried to send a telegram he was obliged to change the address from "Petrograd" to "Leningrad," but on the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, we are told, the name Leningrad will not appear, and the city will be called either Petrograd or St Petersburg. Perhaps the members of the Lucy Stone League will approve of this.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 29 192

The Ithaca Festival Association has organized for the season and, according to the Journal-News of that city, is looking forward to new successes under the leadership of Albert Edmund Brown. A program book outlining the features of the festival will be issued and the purpose of the association is to give to the people of Ithaca annually a festival of the highest musical order, and to form a city-wide organization to carry out the plans effectively. Incidentally it is noticed that the concert series at Cornell university is to be opened by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
LEADER
OCT 29 1924

Leningrad May Cause Boston Revolution.

Musical Boston is in immediate danger of a revolution. The word Leningard has appeared in programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has been blamed for the atrocity.

Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden society, the Apollo club, the Harvard Musical Assn. and a director of the Harvard Alumni chorus has written an editorial about it in a weekly newspaper he owns and Koussevitzky, in turn, has discharged responsibility.

After it's all over the world will know that Mr. Guild owns a weekly newspaper and that Mr. Koussevitzky believes in Petrograd rather than Leningrad.

ESTABLISHED 1865
From OCT 29 1924
The Nation
New York City

FACTS ARE SAID TO BE stubborn things. But some people are so much more stubborn than facts that facts become non-existent to their prejudices and propaganda. The words défaitiste and défaitisme—coined in France in the bitter years of the European War—fill so evident a need in universal speech that they have been taken over into English as "defeatist" and "defeatism," and incorporated with suitable changes into other languages. Yet the French Academy, in a spirit, we suppose, of outraged patriotism voted the other day not to admit them to the dictionary. Likewise we note that Mr. Courtenay Guild of Boston has protested against the use of Leningrad instead of Petrograd or St. Petersburg on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra," he expostulates, "it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor." The Russian director disclaims any hand in the matter—as well he may. But we wonder what the excited Mr. Guild would say if someone in Holland should start a movement for addressing letters no longer to New York but to Nieuw Amsterdam.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
OCT 29 1924

"Leningrad" On A Program Shocks Boston Patriots.

From the Boston Post.

Surprised and irritated that St. Petersburg—or more recently Petrograd—should be referred to as "Leningrad" in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, said he had hesitated to voice a protest in fear of offending some of those in control of the famous musical organization.

Several symphony patrons have become highly indignant over what they declare to be the deliberate flaunting in the face of the Boston public of a word they regard as too suggestive of bolshevism and the Red Government of the Russian Soviets.

This indignation was mistakenly directed toward Koussevitzky. No American citizen could possibly have such vigorous objections to the word "Leningrad" as he does; it is associated with painful memories, he said.

Courtenay Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, was so indignant when he found "Leningrad" that he dashed off the following editorial in the Commercial Bulletin, a weekly newspaper he owns:

> As the name of Lenine is abhorrent to Americans who value the blessings of civilization, and as our Government has refused to recognize the usurping oligarchy that is called the Soviet Government of Russia, it comes as a shock to conservative Bostonians to find the city that was known as St. Petersburg until 10 years ago referred to as "Leningrad" on the program of the Boston Symphony Concerts.
>
> Not once only, but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear on the first program of the season, and while there may be some excuse for using the name for the city today, what possible justification can be offered for stating that a brilliant musician who died in 1873 was a pupil of the "Leningrad Conservatory?"
>
> If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 30 1924

ABUSE OF ENCORES

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—I trust Mr. Koussevitzky will b won from the idea of encores at sym phony concerts or will confine encore to orchestral compositions. One charm of the concert by the superb orchestr has been the restraint put upon solo ists by the no encore rule. I drea to think of what sopranos and othe singers would inflict upon a sufferin audience were they allowed to respon to applause in any manner other tha bowing.

The abuse of encores has spoile many a fine song recital. Let's hav none of it at Symphony concerts.

B. SHARP.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be as fine a concert as Lowell will have this year.

The concert will be an event in the sense that it will be the first time that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra away from Greater Boston.

Mr. Koussevitzky has long been a dominant figure in the world of symphonic music. Probably no man ever came to this country more handicapped than he by what was expected of him.

That he has made good on expectation is but affirming the judgment of every one who has heard one of his Boston concerts. That the orchestra will quickly reach its former place of undisputed superiority, under his genius, is now taken for granted.

Mr. Koussevitzky has broken precedent in his triumphs. Saturday last he broke a precedent of 43 years' standing when he allowed a piece to be repeated in response to a tremendous ovation.

For his Lowell program he has planned with great care. He will offer a program well calculated to test the superb powers of his men. It will include the number which broke the precedent. Nothing on the program is "high brow" in the sense that it can not be enjoyed by the average concertgoer. This statement is made to help dissipate the false notion that a symphony concert can not be enjoyed by the same wide public to whom great concert artists appeal. Lowell has always supported concerts of worth. Lowell undoubtedly will support this concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in a way that it deserves.

Great care has been taken to make it possible for every one to hear this concert. It ought not to be missed by any music lover. It is felt that this concert offers just as much enjoyment as Frieda Hempel or Maria Jeritza whom the Star series presented when they were comparatively unknown to the wide public.

For this concert it is possible to get seats in any part of the house at a moderate price. The Boston Symphony orchestra, when given a chance by the unthinking, can do more than any one to spread the worth of good music and develop an appreciation of it.

Seats for the concert are now on sale at Steinert's, 130 Merrimack street. Mail orders will be filled and reservations accepted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 30 1924

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening comprises these compositions, to be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky: Overture to "Oberon," Roussel's Symphony, B flat, the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music, from "Dusk of the Gods," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Roussel's Symphony, in three movements, was produced at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris in March, 1922. Mr. Koussevitzky brought the Symphony out at one of his concerts in Paris in October, 1923. The first movement is intended to express the enthusiastic ardor of youth. The second, fleeting joys, then deep impressions of a sentimental nature; the third, sorrow, bitterness, revolt and at the end the serenity that brings peace and raises man above his passions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
OURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 30 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Beautiful music by an orchestra of 105 trained musicians under the skilled direction of a world famous conductor will be the treat afforded Lowell music lovers in the Memorial Auditorium next Sunday afternoon when the Boston Symphony orchestra comes here for a single concert.

Lowell will have the unique privilege of being the first place outside Greater Boston where the orchestra will be heard since Serge Koussevitzky, its new conductor, took charge. It is destined to prove an event in local musical annals. Seats are selling rapidly at Steinert's, 130 Merrimack street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SCHENECTADY N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1924

BOSTON SMYPHONY.

Schenectady musical enthusiasts, particularly those who expect to attend the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the armory, Monday night, November 10, will be interested to learn that the organization broke its "no encore" rule for the first time in its history of 43 years, at the concert of the orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Saturday. They will be specially interested because the number encored was "The Flight of the Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, that is to be played at the Schenectady concert. This is how the Boston Post tells about the episode in part:

The piece was of most intense brilliance and played with the nth degree of elegance and lightness, but all too short.

The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitsky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his band. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the handclapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee' was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

From this it is evident that the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has a mind of his own, and that the audience may expect exceptional things in his interpretations at the coming concert. The seat sale will open Monday morning at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and the Wallace Company. Mail orders, if sent to Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons at once, will be filled before the opening of the public sales.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 29 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has slightly revised the program for the Lowell concert to be given in the Memorial Auditorium next Sunday afternoon at 3.15 o'clock.

For the Concert Grosso of Handel, as originally set at the opening of the program, he has substituted another ancient concerto by Emanuel Bach. Some changes have been made in the Russian numbers on the program, and by all reports of performances in Boston, they will be to the added pleasure of the audience. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and the Roman Carnival overture of Berlioz, as originally announced, are retained. In detail then the program will be as follows:

Bach, C. P. E.—
Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto
III. Allegro

Berlioz—
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9

Rachmaninov—
"Vocalise" (arranged for orchestra by the composer)

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"Dubinouchka" (Russian folk song)

Moussorgsky—
Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from the Opera "Tsar Saltan"

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. (Allegro: Trio
IV. (Allegro

The concerto chosen for the opening of the program was composed by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, third son of Johann Sebastian. Mr. Koussevitzky heard it played at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. He finally had an arrangement made for modern woodwind, horn and strings, and it is this version which will be heard in the concert here.

The Russian music of the program promises to be of unusual interest. "Dubinouchka" is an arrangement of a well known folk song. The prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" illustrates dawn coming over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The opera itself had for its subject the conflict between the old and the new Russia. Moussorgsky left it unfinished and it was completed by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it in Paris last year, but it has never been performed in America.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is from the second act of a fairy opera. For the stage performance there were voice parts. Later it was scored for instruments alone. It depicts in playful mood, with a characteristic buzz, a bumble-bee coming out of the sea and flying about a swan.

Played at the Symphony concerts in Boston last week, it was received with unfeigned delight. In fact, so insistent was the applause at the Saturday evening performance that Mr. Koussevitzky broke a long-standing and rigorously observed precedent and repeated the number, evidently to the amazement, but as clearly to the satisfaction of the audience. By all reports, then, there is pleasure in store for those who listen to it here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
OCT 29 1924

Kermit Roosevelt tells us that when he was in Soviet Russia—the name of which isn't "Russia" any more—and tried to send a telegram he was obliged to change the address from "Petrograd" to "Leningrad," but on the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, we are told, the name Leningrad will not appear, and the city will be called either Petrograd or St Petersburg. Perhaps the members of the Lucy Stone League will approve of this.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 29 192

The Ithaca Festival Association has organized for the season and, according to the Journal-News of that city, is looking forward to new successes under the leadership of Albert Edmund Brown. A program book outlining the features of the festival will be issued and the purpose of the association is to give to the people of Ithaca annually a festival of the highest musical order, and to form a city-wide organization to carry out the plans effectively. Incidentally it is noticed that the concert series at Cornell university is to be opened by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
LEADER
OCT 29 1924

Leningrad May Cause Boston Revolution.

Musical Boston is in immediate danger of a revolution. The word Leningard has appeared in programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has been blamed for the atrocity.

Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden society, the Apollo club, the Harvard Musical Assn. and a director of the Harvard Alumni chorus has written an editorial about it in a weekly newspaper he owns and Koussevitzky, in turn, has discharged responsibility.

After it's all over the world will know that Mr. Guild owns a weekly newspaper and that Mr. Koussevitzky believes in Petrograd rather than Leningrad.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 29 1924
The Nation
New York City

FACTS ARE SAID TO BE stubborn things. But some people are so much more stubborn than facts that facts become non-existent to their prejudices and propaganda. The words défaitiste and défaitisme—coined in France in the bitter years of the European War—fill so evident a need in universal speech that they have been taken over into English as "defeatist" and "defeatism," and incorporated with suitable changes into other languages. Yet the French Academy, in a spirit, we suppose, of outraged patriotism voted the other day not to admit them to the dictionary. Likewise we note that Mr. Courtenay Guild of Boston has protested against the use of Leningrad instead of Petrograd or St. Petersburg on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra," he expostulates, "it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor." The Russian director disclaims any hand in the matter—as well he may. But we wonder what the excited Mr. Guild would say if someone in Holland should start a movement for addressing letters no longer to New York but to Nieuw Amsterdam.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE,
MD.
EVE. SUN
OCT 29 1924

"Leningrad" On A Program Shocks Boston Patriots.

From the Boston Post.

Surprised and irritated that St. Petersburg—or more recently Petrograd—should be referred to as "Leningrad" in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, said he had hesitated to voice a protest in fear of offending some of those in control of the famous musical organization.

Several symphony patrons have become highly indignant over what they declare to be the deliberate flaunting in the face of the Boston public of a word they regard as too suggestive of bolshevism and the Red Government of the Russian Soviets.

This indignation was mistakenly directed toward Koussevitzky. No American citizen could possibly have such vigorous objections to the word "Leningrad" as he does; it is associated with painful memories, he said.

Courtenay Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, was so indignant when he found "Leningrad" that he dashed off the following editorial in the Commercial Bulletin, a weekly newspaper he owns:

> As the name of Lenine is abhorrent to Americans who value the blessings of civilization, and as our Government has refused to recognize the usurping oligarchy that is called the Soviet Government of Russia, it comes as a shock to conservative Bostonians to find the city that was known as St. Petersburg until 10 years ago referred to as "Leningrad" on the program of the Boston Symphony Concerts.
>
> Not once only, but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear on the first program of the season, and while there may be some excuse for using the name for the city today, what possible justification can be offered for stating that a brilliant musician who died in 1873 was a pupil of the "Leningrad Conservatory?"
>
> If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 30 1924

ABUSE OF ENCORES

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—I trust Mr. Koussevitzky will l won from the idea of encores at sym phony concerts or will confine encore to orchestral compositions. One charı of the concert by the superb orchestr has been the restraint put upon solc ists by the no encore rule. I drea to think of what sopranos and othe singers would inflict upon a sufferin audience were they allowed to respon to applause in any manner other tha bowing.

The abuse of encores has spoile many a fine song recital. Let's hav none of it at Symphony concerts.

B. SHARP.

PLEAS FOR MERCY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be as fine a concert as Lowell will have this year.

The concert will be an event in the sense that it will be the first time that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra away from Greater Boston.

Mr. Koussevitzky has long been a dominant figure in the world of symphonic music. Probably no man ever came to this country more handicapped than he by what was expected of him.

That he has made good on expectation is but affirming the judgment of every one who has heard one of his Boston concerts. That the orchestra will quickly reach its former place of undisputed superiority, under his genius, is now taken for granted.

Mr. Koussevitzky has broken precedent in his triumphs. Saturday last he broke a precedent of 43 years' standing when he allowed a piece to be repeated in response to a tremendous ovation.

For his Lowell program he has planned with great care. He will offer a program well calculated to test the superb powers of his men. It will include the number which broke the precedent. Nothing on the program is "high brow" in the sense that it can not be enjoyed by the average concertgoer. This statement is made to help dissipate the false notion that a symphony concert can not be enjoyed by the same wide public to whom great concert artists appeal. Lowell has always supported concerts of worth. Lowell undoubtedly will support this concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in a way that it deserves.

Great care has been taken to make it possible for every one to hear this concert. It ought not to be missed by any music lover. It is felt that this concert offers just as much enjoyment as Frieda Hempel or Maria Jeritza whom the Star series presented when they were comparatively unknown to the wide public.

For this concert it is possible to get seats in any part of the house at a moderate price. The Boston Symphony orchestra, when given a chance by the unthinking, can do more than any one to spread the worth of good music and develop an appreciation of it.

Seats for the concert are now on sale at Steinert's, 130 Merrimack street. Mail orders will be filled and reservations accepted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 30 1924

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening comprises these compositions, to be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky: Overture to "Oberon," Roussel's Symphony, B flat, the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music, from "Dusk of the Gods," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Roussel's Symphony, in three movements, was produced at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris in March, 1922. Mr. Koussevitzky brought the Symphony out at one of his concerts in Paris in October, 1923. The first movement is intended to express the enthusiastic ardor of youth. The second, fleeting joys, then deep impressions of a sentimental nature; the third, sorrow, bitterness, revolt and at the end the serenity that brings peace and raises man above his passions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
OURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 30 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Beautiful music by an orchestra of 105 trained musicians under the skilled direction of a world famous conductor will be the treat afforded Lowell music lovers in the Memorial Auditorium next Sunday afternoon when the Boston Symphony orchestra comes here for a single concert.

Lowell will have the unique privilege of being the first place outside Greater Boston where the orchestra will be heard since Serge Koussevitzky, its new conductor, took charge. It is destined to prove an event in local musical annals. Seats are selling rapidly at Steinert's, 130 Merrimack street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1924

BOSTON SMYPHONY.

Schenectady musical enthusiasts, particularly those who expect to attend the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the armory, Monday night, November 10, will be interested to learn that the organization broke its "no encore" rule for the first time in its history of 43 years, at the concert of the orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Saturday. They will be specially interested because the number encored was "The Flight of the Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, that is to be played at the Schenectady concert. This is how the Boston Post tells about the episode in part:

The piece was of most intense brilliance and played with the nth degree of elegance and lightness, but all too short.

The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitsky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his band. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the handclapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee' was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

From this it is evident that the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has a mind of his own, and that the audience may expect exceptional things in his interpretations at the coming concert. The seat sale will open Monday morning at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and the Wallace Company. Mail orders, if sent to Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons at once, will be filled before the opening of the public sales.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 29 192

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has slightly revised the program for the Lowell concert to be given in the Memorial Auditorium next Sunday afternoon at 3.15 o'clock.

For the Concert Grosso of Handel, as originally set at the opening of the program, he has substituted another ancient concerto by Emanuel Bach. Some changes have been made in the Russian numbers on the program, and by all reports of performances in Boston, they will be to the added pleasure of the audience. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and the Roman Carnival overture of Berlioz, as originally announced, are retained. In detail then the program will be as follows:

Bach, C. P. E.—
Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto
III. Allegro

Berlioz—
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9

Rachmaninov—
"Vocalise" (arranged for orchestra by the composer)

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"Dubinouchka" (Russian folk song)

Moussorgsky—
Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina"

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from the Opera "Tsar Saltan"

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. (Allegro; Trio
IV. (Allegro

The concerto chosen for the opening of the program was composed by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, third son of Johann Sebastian. Mr. Koussevitzky heard it played at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. He finally had an arrangement made for modern woodwind, horn and strings, and it is this version which will be heard in the concert here.

The Russian music of the program promises to be of unusual interest. "Dubinouchka" is an arrangement of a well known folk song. The prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" illustrates dawn coming over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The opera itself had for its subject the conflict between the old and the new Russia. Moussorgsky left it unfinished and it was completed by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it in Paris last year, but it has never been performed in America.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is from the second act of a fairy opera. For the stage performance there were voice parts. Later it was scored for instruments alone. It depicts in playful mood, with a characteristic buzz, a bumble-bee coming out of the sea and flying about a swan.

Played at the Symphony concerts in Boston last week, it was received with unfeigned delight. In fact, so insistent was the applause at the Saturday evening performance that Mr. Koussevitzky broke a long-standing and rigorously observed precedent and repeated the number, evidently to the amazement, but as clearly to the satisfaction of the audience. By all reports, then, there is pleasure in store for those who listen to it here.

168

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 31 1924

Incidents and Prospecst

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitsky, the orchestra and the audience [illegible] relatively take their ease. No Prokofiev will spur them; no Roussel tax them. For novel number the conductor proposes Ravel's version for orchestra of Musorgsky's twelve piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." They are impressions in tones, humorous, sardonic, fanciful, graphic. There are linking measures as well. The ingenuity and incisiveness of composer and transcriber go hand in hand. For the rest, Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont" begins the program. A Symphony of Mozart in G minor and Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Chaikovsky continue it.

The enrichment of the modern orchestra abates not. To gain a desired color, accent, suggestion, in his new "Memories of My Childhood," Mr. Loeffler directs the inclusion of "four mouth harmonicas." Even Mahler overlooked them.

Following current fashion, the People's Orchestra omits a Symphony from the program of its first concert at the St. James Theater on Sunday afternoon next. The chosen pieces are Elgar's lively Overture, "In London Town" ("Cockaigne"); Liszt's Second Piano-Concerto, in A major; Chaikovsky's Serenade for Strings; Svendsen's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Mollenhauer will be the conductor and Mr. Gebhard, the pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 31 1924

DID SHE TIP THE CONDUCTOR?

As the World Wags:

Honegger's "Pacific 231," produced here by Mr. Koussevitzky, is an extremely realistic composition. It is supposed to portray an express train thundering along at night. The portrayal succeeded. For at the first swish of steam voiced by the violin 'cellos and stringed basses, the lady in the berth just ahead of mine suddenly awoke, rubbed the sleep from her eyes and began making her toilet. She started with a powder blast; then rouged up a bit, got out the old family comb; in fact, did everything but take a bath. And she had her wraps on when the porter came to carry out her bag as the train slowed down. C. N. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 31 1924

PATRIOTIC FERVOR.

Sad is the life of a super-patriot, full of nightmares and visions of the country, the constitution, the home, the church—everything worth while—falling to ruin in a revolution.

We discussed the other day the case of that eminent patriot, S. Stanwood Menken, whose efforts to keep out Countess Karolyi of Hungary met with failure. But Mr. Menken, when it comes to seeing red, is after all a tyro compared to Courtenay Guild of Boston.

Mr. Guild is one of the supporters of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Imagine his consternation when on opening his program the other day he saw therein the name "Leningrad." In a fine frenzy he wrote a piece to the newspapers about it.

"As the name of Lenine is abhorrent to Americans who value the blessings of civilization," he said, "and as our government has refused to recognize the usurping aligarchy that is called the Soviet government of Russia, it comes as a shock to conservative Bostonians to find the city that was known as Saint Petersburg until ten years ago referred to as Leningrad on the program. Not only once but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear."

There ought to be some way to reward patriotism of this character. How about a scholarship in the electoral college?

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 31 1924

THE WORLD OF BOOKS

The first concert of this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, introduced to America a new conductor of eminent talent, Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. It also precipitated a furious and futile protest against the use of the legally correct name Leningrad in the program book, edited with scrupulous scholarship by Philip Hale. It also brought forward an orchestral composition of which a locomotive was the subject. This was, perhaps, the most daringly modern innovation of the three. Yet Philip Hale in the program book was able to enumerate a respectable list of writings of which the locomotive is the hero.

Needless to say, a steam locomotive has been the inspiring agent in all these works. The electric locomotive has not yet had its singers, and seems little likely to do so. And beyond the electric locomotive the turbine locomotive is already here—quite the least engaging of all, esthetically, whatever its complicated perfections in the science of engineering. But, for that matter, the steam locomotive is being so disfigured by huge size and the profusion of external appliances that its later examples seem more like a misshapen, lumbering animal than a mechanism endowed with personality.

The composer, who has made use of the locomotive as the subject of an orchestral composition, is Arthur Honegger, of Swiss birth, whose musical education and career have been largely under French influences. "I have always had a passionate love for locomotives," Mr Honegger is quoted as saying. "To me they—and I love them passionately as others are passionate in their love for horses or women—are like living creatures." Women will not perhaps feel flattered by the phrase, "horses or women," in which they are relegated to second place as an object of passionate devotion. Possibly, however, he desired to distinguish between two types of love, and put love of horses first as more akin in esthetic purity to his own love for locomotives.

How does the locomotive fare as the subject of a work of art? According to the critics, Mr Honegger's composition, "Pacific 231," described as an "orchestral movement," is clever rather than emotionally suggestive. His purpose, it may be, is more interesting than his accomplishment. "What I wanted to express in the 'Pacific' is not the noise of an engine, but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it." So he undertook to express the locomotive's "quiet respiration in a state of immobility, its effort for moving, the progressive increase of speed, and the pathetic state of an engine of 300 tons driven in the night at a speed of 120 kilometers an hour."

Honegger's subject, "Pacific 231," is chosen in recognition of the Pacific type of engine, familiar in France as in this country. The number 231 is not so obvious. It represents the arrangement of wheels—two of one kind, three of another, and one of another—on each side. In this country the number of wheels of each class on both sides are commonly employed in designating the wheel arrangement, and thus the type. A Pacific, in other words, is 4-6-2, rather than 2-3-1.

"The locomotive engine," says Mr Hale, "has been the theme of strange tales by Dickens, Marcel, Schwob, Kipling, and of Zola's novel, 'La Bete Humaine.' It is also the theme of Abel Gance's film 'Roue,' for which it is said Honegger adapted music, and the American film, 'The Iron Horse.'" Among poems on the locomotive, Whitman's "To a Locomotive in Winter" is most noteworthy:—

Thee for my recitative,
Thee in the driving storm even as now, the snow, the winter day declining,
Thee in thy panoply, thy measur'd dual throbbing and this heat convulsive,
Thy black cylindric body, golden brass and silvery steel,

Through gale or calm, now swift, now slack, yet steadily careering:
Type of the modern—emblem of motion and power—pulse of the continent,
For once come serve the Muse and merge in verse, even as here I see thee.
With storm and buffeting gusts of wind and falling snow,
By day thy warning ringing bell to sound its notes,
By night thy silent signal lamps to swing.

Fierce-throated beauty!
Roll through my chant with all thy lawless music, thy swinging lamps at night,
Thy madly-whistled laughter, echoing, rumbling, like an earthquake, rousing all,
Law of thyself complete, thine own track firmly holding.
(No sweetness debonair of tearful harp or glib piano thine.)
The trill of shrieks by rocks and hills return'd,
Launch'd o'er the prairies wide, across the lakes,
To the free skies unspent and glad and strong.

While Whitman celebrates the locomotive as an "emblem of motion and power," and "type of the modern," the imaginative effects that he produces have the necessary elements of human appeal. Will the time come when emblems of motion and power, and of their kindred animal quality, will, utterly suppress the ordinary emotional claims and charm of art? The disintegration that has overtaken visual and poetic art might seem to indicate a structural collapse. Yet the effects which modern art strives for are the reverse of objective. They are the faintest and most tremulous impressions.

The real peril, however, is not collective decadence—in the artistic sense—but the development on an overwhelming scale of those qualities of personality which are chiefly satisfied by motion and power rather than by contemplation and appreciation. The present struggle for wealth and comfort, which is the dominant characteristic of American life, may result deliberately or fortuitously in a certain endowment of culture; it may crush out the aspirations for culture altogether. No one can predict with assurance.

In the public reaction to its physical environment, its standards of taste are uniformly higher than 25 years ago. The gain in architecture and house furnishings is tremendous. Intellectual standards as denoted in composite reading matter seem to have declined. Amusement and sport have encroached upon the pleasures of contemplation and esthetic appreciation. Yet the minority which cares intensely for art seems never to lack fresh accessions. Possibly this minority is becoming more firmly established; possibly not. The universities are either developing in the direction of cultural betterment or of the prevailing materialism. That here and there they are awakening the social conscience and cultivating independence of thought is one sign that they are—sporadically at least—genuinely alive. But their obligation does not end there. As well as political logic they must aim at enrichment. Many believe that the minimum low point has been passed. But the truth is we hardly know where we stand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 31 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 musicians, to be given in the Memorial Auditorium at 3.15 next Sunday afternoon, promises to rank high among the local musical events of the season. A varied and not too "high-brow" program has been arranged for the Lowell concert. Added interest attaches to the event that Lowell will have the distinction of being the first city outside outside of Greater Boston to hear the orchestra under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to America after successive triumphs in Europe. Seats are selling rapidly at Steinert's, 130 Merrimack street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD

OCT 18 1924

The Locomotive Put to Music

The railroad locomotive put to music is what is offered in a work known as "Pacific 231" by Arthur Honegger to be rendered by the Boston Symphony orchestra during the coming season. According to the brief description which we have seen the music will simulate "the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood as a thirty-ton train hurtles through the dark night racing one hundred and twenty miles an hour."

That is a pretty light train to go so fast, and there is no record of any train's having made one hundred and twenty miles an hour, but something must be allowed for poetic—or should we say musical?—license. The point is that the locomotive in action has appealed to a composer as a fitting theme for music of a class worthy to be played by the Boston symphony.

Kipling did in fiction what Mr. Honegger has done in music. His ".007" is the classic of the locomotive. In it the engines on the road and in the yards talk and chaff each other and recite their exploits in a way that seems plausible enough. Kipling even wrote the song of the locomotive, resorting to what in the old days at school the children who took rhetoric were taught to call onomatopoeia:

With a michnai—ghignai—shtingal! Yah! Yah! Yah!
Ein—zwei—drei—Mutter! Yah! Yah! Yah!
She climb upon der shteeple
Und she frighten all der people.
Singin' michnai—ghignai—shtingal! Yah Yah!

This is not the most felicitous verse that Kipling ever wrote, but if it is said at high speed with the right accentuation there is some suggestion of the racing locomotive. Possibly music will afford a better medium than words for simulating the sound of the iron horse.

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 18 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE NOV. 2

Program Arranged by Director Koussevitzky Favors Russian School.

Although Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is the selection for the Lowell program of the Boston Symphony orchestra when it comes to the Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, the rest of the program greatly favors the Russian school of composition.

The program is one that is built to give the maximum enjoyment to the greatest number of people. Restated, the program is meant to be one that any one who loves music can enjoy without the necessary deep study in orchestration and composition which some of the Boston Symphony concerts called for.

Lowell will be the first city outside Boston to enjoy Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, who in a short time has won a secure place in the affections of Boston music lovers. There is great interest and not a little curiosity in the new leader and the fact that Lowell will have him before any other city (New York must wait until Thanksgiving night) only accentuates the strides that Lowell has made in music since the Auditorium was opened two years ago.

The program as announced by Mr. Koussevitzky:

Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10.
Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.
Rachmaninoff—"Vocalize" (arranged for the orchestra by the composer).
Rimsky-Korsakoff — "Dubinouchka" (Russian folk song).
Moussorgsky—Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina."
Rimsky-Korsakoff—"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," sherzo from the opera "Tsar Saltan."

Beethoven—Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL
OCT 16 1924

A Political Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra plays a new symphony called "Pacific, 231." In it the composer gives you an interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive, at rest and in motion. "The music," says the composer himself, Arthur Honegger, "begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

There is also plenty of room in the musical world for a political symphony. It might not be very much like the sighing of gentle spring breezes, but it would be exciting. Certain old line politicians could be drafted to handle the brass, ward politicians could finger the strings, lame ducks could beat the drums, and there would be plenty of folks, ambitious to get into the cabinet, to play second fiddle. Big business might be willing to furnish a director. What squawks there'd be, what pulling and hauling, what melodious disharmony in such a symphony—and how many would stay to the end?

THIS CLIPPING FROM BINGHAMTON,
N. Y.
PRESS
OCT 2 0 1924

OBJECT TO LENINGRAD.

Boston, Oct. 20—(Associated Press)—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FR
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 19 1924

Koussevitzky's Novel Ideas

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That by some, and perhaps by many, the potential interest of a symphony concert is measured in terms of the soloist announced for that particular afternoon or evening there is, in the words of the Grand Inquisitor, "no probable possible shadow of doubt."

Recall, for example, how, in years gone by, the line of applicants for "rush" seats has waxed when a Farrar or a Kreisler was to sing or play, and how it has dwindled when the soloist has been "some one you never heard of" or, as was now and then the case, there was no soloist at all.

Yet, while that attitude is but a natural reflection of the American fetish for big names that has been responsible also for the "star" system so deplored by our operatic and theatrical managers, as applied to a symphony concert it is manifestly erroneous and wrong-headed.

Music for Its Own Sake

First of all, in any given concert the time allotted to the soloist is, of necessity, but a small part of the whole. Secondly, for that time orchestra and conductor are unjustly and unfittingly relegated to a poor second place. And thirdly, while there are notable exceptions, it is too often true that the piece or pieces contributed by the "assisting artist" are intrinsically of slight interest. How few, after all, are the violin or piano concertos worth hearing for their own sake, and how inconsequential are too many of the airs sung at symphony concerts throughout the land!

To say all this is by no means to urge that all soloists be banned from all symphony concerts forever more, although there are some who would shed no tears over even such wholesale dismissal. But, as in all things, there is a happy middle ground. There is, and always will be, some music old and new, eminently worth the hearing, that is possible only when a pianist, violinist or singer assists the orchestra. A ban on soloists would have deprived last season's audiences at our own symphony concerts of the exquisite "Scheherazade" of Ravel in a memorable performance by Vera Janacopulos, the orchestra and Mr. Monteux, while few events of that same season exceeded in interest Mr. Rosenthal's playing of Chopin's Concerto in E minor.

Within certain reasonable limits, too, a symphony orchestra must of course exist as a business institution, and, under the artistic advantages or disadvantages of assisting artists, if the public wants them the public must have them—that is, unless the public can be persuaded to support the orchestra for its own sake.

Here in Boston it is that, precisely, which has happened this year. Not within long recollection has the advance announcement of soloists listed so few names—and never before has the demand for tickets been so great. That the Friday concerts should be sold out on subscription is nothing new, but the near approach to a similar condition of things for Saturday evenings is a decided novelty.

Needless to say, it is Mr. Koussevitzky who has wrought this miracle. For the first time in many years the Symphony Orchestra has as its conductor one who has excited popular interest and curiosity as no array of soloists, however brilliant and distinguished, might have excited them. At last it is as it should be—it is the conductor and the orchestra who hold first place.

In this matter of soloists Mr. Koussevitzky holds to one sound principle: namely, that the sole justification for such embellishment to a symphony concert is the performing of some composition that is possible only with a soloist, and if that soloist may be the composer giving voice to his own music, so much the better. Thus we will have this year two of the foremost Russian composers, Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky, each as pianist in his own concerto.

Then, too, we are to hear from Albert Spalding the new violin concerto of Respighi and from Richard Burgin the still newer concerto of Prokofiev, two novelties of genuine significance. And with assurance it may be said that the other soloists of the season, Mme. Matzenauer, the pianist Cortot and Borovsky and our own Maier and Pattison, will be heard primarily for the interest of the music they will perform and only secondarily for the interest attaching to their wholly excellent performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND,
OHIO
NEWS
OCT 19 1924

Koussevitsky Stirs Blood of Bostonians

By Pierre V. R. Key.

NEW YORK, Oct. 18.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

PIERRE V.R. KEY

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variation, on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

Alma Gluck Returns

THIS CLIPPING FROM UTICA,
N. Y.
OBSERVER
OCT 20 1924

Object to Soviet Name

Boston, Oct. 20—(Associated Press).—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ST. LOUIS,
MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
OCT 19 1924

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, October 18.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So, for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub, and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of William Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestra future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TELEGRAM
OCT 20 1924

"Leningrad" Starts Row At Symphony

The appearance of the word "Leningfad" in place of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in the program books of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has caused a protest to be made to the trustees of this famous musical organization.

Several Symphony patrons voiced their objections loudly and placed the blame upon Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor, whom they accuses of using this method of flaunting his political views.

However, the charge is unjust as the new conductor has just as much a dislike for the word "Leningrad" as those who are protesting. He said today that he was amazed to find the name on the program, but refrained from protesting for fear of offending those in control.

As there is some misunderstanding, the trustees will probably issue a statement at a later date clearing the entire matter up.

1170

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Sun
N. Y. City
OCT 20 1924

Blind

One day last week a blind violinist played in the street in front of the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburgh. Blind musicians have doubtless played there before—they are not infrequent. A music lover, goaded to desperation, will from time to time resort to bribery to make them stop. Thus they eke out their precarious livelihood. In this case, strange things happened. Men, hurrying past, paused, listened, stayed. A crowd gathered. An occasional ear was strained to catch the excellences of an unexpected technique. For two hours the crowd stood, respectfully attentive to the program of classical favorites—Schumann's Traumerei, the prison scene from Trovatore, the Intermezzo from Cavalleria. Then the violin was silent again. A buzz of surprised admiration from the gathered audience; a collection on the spot netted more than $50 for the sightless wanderer with the magic gift.

Sixteen years ago, a new star was heralded on the horizon of music. A young Dutch violinist, Peter van der Meer, late of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a violin recital in Carnegie Hall. His interpretation of Paganini's Concerto in D Major met with especial acclaim. But soon Van der Meer was forgotten. In 1915, he became blind, after a long illness. He spent six years in the Bellevue Hospital, Manhattan. Recently he was pronounced cured—but his sight had left him forever.

Peter Van der Meer, who enthralled a street crowd in Pittsburgh, has gone on his way southward, the magic violin under his arm. Where he is going he knows not. He has no money other than the gifts of casual hearers.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SANTA FE, N. MEX.
NEW MEXICAN
OCT 20 1924

"LENINGRAD" WILL NOT APPEAR IN BOSTON ORCHESTRA PRINTING

Boston, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra over the use of the name Lenningrad, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the Orchestra, will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of Imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky" he said.

"I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOVERSVILLE
N. Y.
LEADER REPUBLICAN
OCT 20 1924

Boston Bans Soviet Name for Petrograd

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR
OCT 20 1924

"Leningrad" on Orchestra Program Arouses Music Lovers of Boston

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, October 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was Ambassador to Russia. In an editorial in his newspaper, Mr. Guild wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin, to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAUNTON,
MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 20 1924

SERGE DENIES PUTTING LENIN IN LIMELIGHT

(By The Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzsky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 20 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRAND NEW ROW

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs, instead of Petrograd, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, the director, disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association.

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor," Guild said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSFIELD,
MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 20 1924

Symphony Will Drop Name of Leningrad

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name "Leningrad" in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital or imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of th—

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUBURN,
N. Y.
Citizen
OCT 20 1924

Against Use of Leningrad.

Boston, Mass., Oct. 20. — Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD
OCT 20 1924

Boston Symphony May Drop Name Leningrad from Program

Complaints Made to Officials and Trustees of Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, will result in having the Soviet name of the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Appolo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
OCT 20 1924

Object to Orchestra Using Soviet Name

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERBURY,
CONN.
AMERICAN
OCT 20 1924

LENINGRAD REMOVED FROM PROGRAMS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Denies All Responsibility for Printing.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, wil result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honer Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitsky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone.

REPORT of the condition of the

OCT 20 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BAN NAME OF SOVIET CAPITAL

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Sun
N Y
OCT - 1924

Blind

One day last week a blind violinist played in the street in front of the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburgh. Blind musicians have doubtless played there before—they are not infrequent. A music lover, goaded to desperation, will from time to time resort to bribery to make them stop. Thus they eke out their precarious livelihood. In this case, strange things happened. Men, hurrying past, paused, listened, stayed. A crowd gathered. An occasional ear was strained to catch the excellences of an unexpected technique. For two hours the crowd stood, respectfully attentive to the program of classical favorites—Schumann's Traumerei, the prison scene from Trovatore, the Intermezzo from Cavalleria. Then the violin was silent again. A buzz of surprised admiration from the gathered audience; a collection on the spot netted more than $50 for the sightless wanderer with the magic gift.

Sixteen years ago, a new star was heralded on the horizon of music. A young Dutch violinist, Peter van der Meer, late of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a violin recital in Carnegie Hall. His interpretation of Paganini's Concerto in D Major met with especial acclaim. But soon Van der Meer was forgotten. In 1915, he became blind, after a long illness. He spent six years in the Bellevue Hospital, Manhattan. Recently he was pronounced cured—but his sight had left him forever.

Peter Van der Meer, who enthralled a street crowd in Pittsburgh, has gone on his way southward, the magic violin under his arm. Where he is going he knows not. He has no money other than the gifts of casual hearers.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SANTA FE, N. MEX.
NEW MEXICAN
OCT 2 0 1924

"LENINGRAD" WILL NOT APPEAR IN BOSTON ORCHESTRA PRINTING

Boston, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston symphony orchestra over the use of the name Lenningrad, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the Orchestra, will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of Imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky" he said.

"I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOVERSVILLE
N. Y.
LEADER REPUBLICAN
OCT 2 0 1924

Boston Bans Soviet Name for Petrograd

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR
OCT 2 0 1924

"Leningrad" on Orchestra Program Arouses Music Lovers of Boston

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, October 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in stead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was Ambassador to Russia. In an editorial in his newspaper, Mr. Guild wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin, to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAUNTON,
MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 2 0 1924

SERGE DENIES PUTTING LENIN IN LIMELIGHT

(By The Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzsky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUBURN,
N. Y.
OCT 2 0 1924

Against Use of Leningrad.

Boston, Mass., Oct. 20. — Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 2 0 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRAND NEW ROW

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs, instead of Petrograd, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, the director, disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," Koussebitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association.

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor," Guild said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSFIELD,
MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 2 0 1924

Symphony Will Drop Name of Leningrad

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name "Leningrad" in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital or imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of th-

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 2 0 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BAN NAME OF SOVIET CAPITAL

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD
OCT 2 0 1924

Boston Symphony May Drop Name Leningrad from Program

Complaints Made to Officials and Trustees of Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 20. — Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, will result in having the Soviet name of the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Appolo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
OCT 2 0 1924

Object to Orchestra Using Soviet Name

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERBURY,
CONN.
AMERICAN
OCT 2 0 1924

LENINGRAD REMOVED FROM PROGRAMS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Denies All Responsibility for Printing.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, wil result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitsky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone.

REPORT of the condition of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL
OCT 20 1924

MUSICAL BOSTON ABHORS LENINGRAD

Newest Name of St. Petersburg, Used in Symphony Programs, Causes Complaints.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Sarge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony orchestra made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone; they took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society; the Apollo club, and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
OCT 20 1924

"LENINGRAD" TO RED FOR SYMPHONY SET

Influential patrons of the Boston Symphony viced indignant protest against the use of the word "Leningrad," Bolshevist name for the former St. Petersburg. The patrons, among them Courtenay Guild, had criticized Serge Kousevitzky, new leader. Kousevitzky denies he was responsible for placing the word on the programs and said that he had reason to hate the Soviet government.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
OCT 20 192

LENINGRAD TABOOED ON MUSIC PROGRAM

Boston, Oct. 20. — Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
OCT 20 1924

NAME LENINGRAD NOT TO APPEAR ON FUTURE PROGRAMS

Boston Symphony Takes Drastic Step

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitsky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lein to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
OCT 20 1924

KOUSSEVITSKY IS MATINEE IDOL

Robert Stearns Writes of Debut of New Boston Symphony Leader

Robert Stearns, our gifted composer-violinist, seems to be gaining in health—which will be a source of real joy to musical Washington—if one can judge from the spirit of a letter to E. H. Droop in which he tells of the American debut, in Boston, of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitsky.

"The program was somewhat new and also included two new pieces, a concerto for organ by Vivaldi and an orchestral number by Honnegar called "Pacific 231"—so-called after the type of a large locomotive engine of which the composer is very fond," Mr. Stearns writes.

"Koussevitsky is tall and graceful, as conductors should be," he adds, affirming his conviction that he will make himself famous here, also by his ability and genius. Then he describes quite fascinatingly the new Honnegar work, Honnegar, one of the new names on our concert programs.

"The piece starts off with the double basses, which seem to give an imitation of the Choo Choo of the engine, after which it goes off in the usual way which locomotives usually go! However, none of the novel instruments commonly known to be used to imitate steam engines, such as the 'trap drummers' outfit, are employed at all, no steam whistles or bell which we would naturally look for with our ears were present. However, the double basses did their 'stunt' and what followed was fully characteristic of the steam locomotive mentioned and classified under the head of 'Pacific 231'."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW LONDON
CONN.
ISSUE OF
OCT 20 1924

NAME LENINGRAD MUST BE ERASED FROM PROGRAM

Boston Symphony Orchestra Bars Soviet Name of Russian Capital.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg, or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name of the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
OCT 20 1924

PROTEST USE OF "LENINGRAD."

Soviet Name for City Will Be Taken From Boston Music Programs.

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenya Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE POTTSVILLE
PA.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 20 1924

Refuse To Honor Lenine On Boston Music Programs

BOSTON.— Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the orchestra, disclaimed responsibility for the use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotsky" he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 20 1924

DIFFERENCES OVER USE OF SOVIET NAME

Leningrad Likely to Be Eliminated From Boston Symphony Programs.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenal Guild, President of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was Ambassador to Russia. In an editorial in his newspaper he wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 20 1924

"LENINGRAD" IS PROTESTED

Soviet Name on Boston Symphony Program to Be Eliminated

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, and brother of the late Curtis Guild who was ambassador to Russia. In an editorial in his newspaper, he wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

172

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NORTHAMPTON
MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 20 1924

'LENINGRAD' OFF SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Soviet Name for Russian Capital to Be Dropped from Printing of Boston Organization

PROTESTS CAUSE ACTION

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra, instead of St. Petersburgh or Petrograd, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of Imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," Mr. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it, because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hadyn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial, published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part: "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
OCT 20 1924

Ban on Use of "Leningrad."

(By The Associated Press.)

Boston, Mass., Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCRANTON, PA.
TIMES
OCT 21 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO DROP "LENINGRAD" FROM PROGRAMS

New Russian Director Abhors Soviet Name For Petrograd—Says Bolsheviki Took Fortune.

Boston, Oct. 21.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 21 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY DROPS LENINGRAD FROM PROGRAMME

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programes of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, will result in having the Soviet name of the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programme of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Appolo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
OCT 21 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BAN NAME OF LENINGRAD

BOSTON, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name of Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 21 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BAN NAME OF SOVIET CAPITAL

BOSTON, Oct. 20.— Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OMAHA NEB.
ISSUE OF
OCT 21 1924

LENINGRAD GOES OFF ORCHESTRA PROGRAMS

Objection Made to the Soviet Name at Boston as Honor to Bolshevists That Is Odious.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian, director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WATERBURY
CONN.
HERALD
OCT 21 1924

'LENINGRAD' IS VERY OFFENSIVE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Mixed Up Again in New Dispute

Boston, Oct 21—"Leningrad" is anathema to Serge Koussevitzky, new Russian conductor of Boston symphony orchestra.

Its use in the program of the orchestra, he insisted to-day, is equally as offensive to him as it was to Courtenay Gould, president of the Harvard Musical association and publisher of the Commercial Bulletin here.

In an editorial in the Bulletin, Gould, a brother of a former Ambassador to Russia, expressed his indignation as follows:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor, in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

It was all a mistake, Koussevitzky said. "I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotsky. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars and it is gone. They took it from me. But I hesitated to speak about the use of this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
OCT 21 1924

'LENINGRAD' STRICKEN FROM BOSTON PROGRAM

BOSTON, MASS. October 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed the responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, President of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YOUNGSTOWN
OHIO
VINDICATOR
OCT 21 1924

Won't Allow Name of Leningrad In Boston Symphony Concerts

[By the Associated Press]

Boston, Oct. 21. — Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, Monday disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money. They took it from me."

Among those protesting was Courtney Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia. In his newspaper, Mr. Guild wrote:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINI
OCT 21 1924

Boston to Drop Soviet Name on Symphony Bill

BOSTON, Oct. 20.

COMPLAINTS made to trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated. Among those protesting was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
OCT 21 19

Bar Soviet Name For St. Petersburg

Printing of Boston Symphony Orchestra To Use Pre-Revolution Listing

Boston, October 10. — Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad in programs of the orchestra instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from the orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital of my country should be called Leningrad in the program of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, President of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Associa[illegible] in an editorial published in a [illegible]skly newspaper which he owns, M[illegible] Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay [illegible] reverence to Lenin to please t[illegible] new leader of our symphony orc[illegible]ra, it may be desirable to look f[illegible] new conductor in spite of the [illegible]ubted ability of our Russian visito[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS,
MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
OCT 21 1924

'LENINGRAD' STRICKEN FROM BOSTON PROGRAM

BOSTON, MASS. October 20.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed the responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, President of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was Ambassador to Russia.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT
OCT 21 1924

ORCHESTRA BARS SOVIET NAME.

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

BANDITS ROB PENBROOK BANK

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. LEDGER
OCT 21 1924

LENINEGRAD TO BE REMOVED FROM ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

Trustees of Boston Symphony Object to Soviet's Name for City

Boston, Oct. 21.—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad, instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd, in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, yesterday disclaimed responsibility for the use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is gone."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
OCT 21 1924

... the children. | 1 P. M.—Ralph Williams' Orchestra. | WOAW, WMC, WFAA

PROTEST USE OF NAME LENINGRAD

Russian Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Disclaims Responsibility.

Boston, Oct. 21.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated yesterday.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin of Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than 1,000,000 in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor, in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 22 1924

The bringing of the Boston Symphony here for a Sunday afternoon concert on Nov. 2 will be an experiment which it will be interesting to watch. Time was when the concerts of the Lowell Orchestral Society, held on Sundays at about the same hour, might be counted upon to draw a large attendance in Huntington hall. It may well be that conditions are again favorable for concerts of the sort.

Except for Cambridge, Lowell will be the first city in the state outside of Boston to have an opportunity to hear the orchestra under the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Russian music will be a prominent feature in the program and Mr. Monteux's successor certainly should be able to give it characteristic and colorful performance, since from Russia he comes. There will be an opportunity to say something of the Russian numbers on the program in this place next week.

For more familiar numbers Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, one of the finest on the list, and the Roman Carnival of Berlioz, a spirited overture in that composer's best vein; while for another classic, the Concerto Grosso of Handel, in D minor will serve to display the stringed instruments of the orchestra.

As it now seems, Raymond Havens, the pianist, will not have a place in the program, Mr. Kroussevitzky, possibly, prefering to make his first appearance here in purely orchestral music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 22 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The early career of Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to the Memorial Auditorium Sunday, Nov. 2, with his Boston Symphony orchestra for the first concert he will direct outside Boston this season, was most conspicuous in the famous orchestra he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. It was characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, hearing symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard before. He is a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS
OCT 21 1924

LENINGRAD PROTESTED ON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

Hereafter Boston Symphony Will Refrain From Using Soviet Name.

BOSTON, Oct. 21.—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital if imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitsky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting aginst the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden siciety, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said, in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

By Gene Burnes

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 22 1924

To criticism of the use in the Boston Symphony program books of the term "Leningrad" instead of St. Petersburg (or should it be Petrograd,) seems to have been somewhat puerile.

It was attributed either to the influence of the new Russian conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, or to a desire of others to show deference to him. As a matter of fact, it happens that Mr. Koussevitzky is prejudiced against the name. As he says, he had a fortune of a million dollars, in our money, all of which was taken from him under the Soviet regime. Far from desiring to honor Lenine or Trotzky, he left Russia because of them.

Nevertheless ... since ...

NORWICH CONN.
BULLETIN
OCT 22 1924

... years ago today.

Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, born in Darmstadt, Germany, 65 years ago ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 22 1924

SOVIET AND SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has refused to recognize the Soviet Government. Or at least it has clearly intimated that it intends to have nothing to do with the Bolshevik régime and that hereafter the name of Leningrad —as the birthplace of composers or the scene of premières of given numbers— will appear upon the concert programmes only as St. Petersburg or Petrograd.

Words spoken in haste tended to lay the blame on the new conductor, M. Serge Koussevitsky, and to suggest that it might be necessary to have him replaced, but M. Koussevitsky is quick to respond that he is the last one in the world to wish to honor Lenin or Trotsky and that he will be very well pleased if he never hears the name again.

For a moment it was all very perplexing. Someone suggested that the issue be dodged by referring to the city on the Neva as "the Russian capital," but someone else discovered that it isn't, since ancient Moscow has come into its own again. A counter proposal was to leave it out of the programmes altogether; but dear, dear! what would the erudite Mr. Philip Hale do when it came time to spell out in glib phrases the career of some new Russian creation which M. Koussevitsky chose to produce before his public?

No, the issue cannot be dodged, and the old seat of the Czars must be mentioned in some way or other. But why not call a spade a spade, even though it is an unpopular spade? Art is international—as witness the succession Muck-Monteux-Koussevitsky—and it has nothing to do with Governments, good or bad. Leningrad is the name of the place and will be, until somebody invades it and changes it to something different, and there seems no valid reason for calling it anything else. Just as reasonably one might call Boston by its former name of Tremont because one doesn't like the English. (There was indeed such a movement once!) And what does it all come to? When M. Koussevitsky steps upon his dais on a winter's Friday and his string choir brings to life once more the magic theme of the Beethoven Fifth will it make a particle of difference to anyone in Boston whether it is a Czar or a Kommissar who sends his enemies to Siberia?

LOS ANGELES
CALIFORNIA
CALIFORNIA TIMES
OCT 24 1924

LOCOMOTIVE'S SONG TO BE INTERPRETED

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL TRANSLATE SOUND INTO MUSIC

[EXCLUSIVE DISPATCH]

BOSTON, Oct. 23.—Modernism in music will play a part in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music to be played will be a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific 231," the piece is called, and in it, Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by precussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tom-tom, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky, concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a thirty ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 100 miles an hour."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
OCT 23 1924

Boston and Leningrad.

Indignant Bostonians have protested against the use of the word Leningrad in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra and a native of Russia, is outspoken in his earnest wish that the one-time capital of the Tsars be termed St. Petersburg or Petrograd.

Mr. Koussevitzky declares that it is because of Lenine and Trotzky that he lost a fortune of a million dollars and had to leave his own country. He would tolerate no echo of Lenine in his new domain of the Boston Symphony.

And yet, heartily as one may detest the theories and practice of the junta that rules at Moscow, a fact remains a fact. Boston is as powerless to decide the name of the Russian city on the Neva as were King Canute and Dame Partington to rule the tides of mighty ocean.

Suppose Willem Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, expressed an unalterable belief that the New England colonies stole a march on the New Netherlands, and in consequence informed the Philharmonic board that only if they substituted New Amsterdam for New York in the title of their society would he remain as its conductor? Suppose the Washington government insisted that the Mikado reigns at Yeddo. Suppose that Germans the world over addressed letters to "Metz" and "Strassburg, Deutschland!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
OCT 23 1924

A Woray Battle

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Mr. Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are variously received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the Postoffice Department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State Street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the Czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps; yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, howevermuch one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this Nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles.

174

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 25 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Music lovers of Lowell and surrounding towns who plan to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra when it comes to the Memorial Auditorium Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, for a single concert, will be interested in the attitude of Serge Koussevitsky, its new Russian leader on the subject of orchestral programs of modern and classical music:

"I would like to make it clear," said the conductor in an interview with Olin Downes of the New York Times last spring, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. But music it not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. * * * As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgement in producing them."

Seats for the Lowell concert, the first outside of Boston, go on sale this morning at Steinert's.

(CHRONICLE)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881
m
OCT 25 1924

Symphony in Third Program

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his third concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon to another interested audience.

Opening with Bach's Concerto in D Major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg, the conductor again gave display of his depth of feeling, his fine imaginings and his skill as director. There was no interrupting applause between the movements. (How quickly we understand.)

The delightful prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, was second choice. Heard here for the first time, its initial performance exquisitely rendered, will leave vivid memory. Under the conductor's careful and interpretive direction it seemed altogether too short.

A most descriptive and felicitous gem was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also heard here for the first time. It proved a delightful variation expressive of the Rimsky-Korsokov whose fantastic opera-pantomime "Le Coq D'or" was heard here in 1918 for the first time.

Again Mr. Koussevitzky saved the Symphony for the closing number—this time giving the much honored place to Brahms and his Symphony No. 4 in E minor, with its four contrasting movements, which after the long Scythian Suite of Prokofieff seemed an arduous task for the conductor and one not beyond the keen appreciation of all present.

FOURTH SYMPHONY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, Serge Koussevitzky will present the following program at the fourth pair of Symphony concerts: Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Albert Roussel's Symphony in B flat (first time in America); and three of Wagner's excerpts—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and the overture to "The Master Singer of Nuremburg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 25 1924

GREAT INTEREST SHOWN IN COMING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY NOV. 10TH

Much interest is in evidence over the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 artists in the armory, Monday night, November 10. Of course there is the usual interest always noticed when this orchestra is announced but this has been accentuated because at the coming event the audience will have its first opportunity to judge the ability of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who has just begun his first year with the orchestra with conspicuous success. According to all report the audience is to see a leader who is even greater than at first expected. As an evidence of the interest in the coming event it is to be noted that George J. Abbott, director of music in the public schools, has just secured 300 seats for the event, these for distribution among school students, and he announces that these are already sold. And the interest will be further increased when it is known that the program will include the variations on a theme of Tschaikowsky, by Arensky; a "Vocalize" by Rachmaninoff and arranged for orchestra by himself; a Russian Folk Song, "Dubinouchka," arranged by Rimsky-Kersakoff; the prelude to the opera "Khovantchina" by Meussergsky, and The Flight of the Bumble Bee from the opera "Tsar Saltan" by Rimsky-Kersakoff. Mail orders for seats for this event, sent to Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, 203 State street, will be filled in the sequence of receipt. The public sale of seats will open at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and at the Wallace Company, on Monday, November 3. On account of the lecture of Walter de la Mare at 7 o'clock, November 10 at Union College, the symphony concert will not begin until 8:30 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 25 1924

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fact that George J. Abbott, director of music in the public schools, has taken 300 tickets for school students for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the State Armory, Monday night, November 10, gives an idea of the interest over the coming concert. And it is well to note that these tickets are already sold. The appearance of the celebrated Boston orchestra always arouses fine anticipation, but this is accentuated this season because Schenectady shall have its first opportunity to see the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who began his engagement with the orchestra this fall with such overwhelming success. It is evident that he is one of the world's greatest conductors, and it is significant that all seats for the entire season of concerts of the organization at New York City, are now entirely taken. Additional interest over the coming concert will be aroused because the program will include this group of Russian composers: Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Arensky; "Vocalize," (arranged for the orchestra by composer), Rachmaninov; "Dubinouchka," (Russian Folk Song), Rimsky Korsakov; prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsy; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, from the Opera "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov.

The complete program will be published in a few days, but the above gives an idea of the treat in store. On account of the lecture of Walter de la Mare at Union College at seven o'clock on the same night, the concert will not begin until half past eight, this in order to accommodate all concerned.

Mail or phone orders for seats sent to local manager, Ben Franklin, at and Sons, will be filled in se- of receipt, and the public sale s will open Monday, November the stores of Cluett and Sons, llace Company and at the Barnpany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
OCT 26 1924

Boston Welcomes Koussevitsky's American Debut

Boston, Oct. 25.—Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Pierre Monteux, has made his first American appearance in the opening concert of the forty-fourth season of the orchestra in Symphony Hall. A capacity audience welcomed the Russian leader, and applauded his work throughout the program.

The critical reception of Mr. Koussevitsky was as favorable as was that of the audience. Although admitting that first impressons must necessarily be hasty, Philip Hale in the Herald said, "Mr. Koussevitsky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism, which works its spell on orchestra and audience. . . . It is evident that he is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head....Hhe knows that melodic figures should be sung, yet he is not given to sentimentalism."

H. T. Parker, writing in the Evening Transcript, commented also on these qualities of magnetism, and remarked with enthusiasm on the skill with which the new leader adapts his manner and clear beat to the style of the music in hand.

The reviewer of the Globe admired the lack of mannerism in Mr. Koussevitsky's leading, writing, "His gestures are always definite commands promptly obeyed." This writer considered the continually sustained interest of the new leader's conducting exceptionally praiseworthy.

This reviewer found Pacific 231 much less violent than he had expected, with its extreme dissonance nevertheless indicative of economy of material, and of "lyric imagination." Mr. Parker was pleased that Honegger is more than noisily imitative in his sketch of a locomotive.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE
OCT 26 1927

PIERRE KEY'S MUSIC ARTICLE

By PIERRE V. R. KEY

New York, Oct. 25.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 23[illegible] (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Kousevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens, he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, wh[illegible] have placed metaphorically on [illegible] pedestal the dynamic Leopold S[illegible]kowski; and the adherents of [illegible]lem Mengelberg, of the New [illegible] Philharmonic, may also hav[illegible] remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestr[illegible] in this town promises som[illegible]ing fireworks. Kouss[illegible] make his first appear[illegible] Thanksgiving night. [illegible] be something doing o o

Alma Gluck Retu[illegible]

Until she rec[illegible] back some fe[illegible] Gluck occup[illegible] the affecti[illegible] country [illegible] singing [illegible] She [illegible] The [illegible] we [illegible]

MARIE SUNDELIUS,
A Metropolitan Opera Soprano Who Is Also Sought After in Concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 26 1924

THE idiocyncrasies of the earnest are strange and puzzling. Here we have the good citizens of Boston protesting because Serge Koussevitsky the director of their orchestra has referred in his program to Leningrad instead of Petrograd or St. Petersburg. "If we are expected," says one of the righteously indignant, "to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new director, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor . . ." It seems not to have occurred to him or to any of his associates in this movement that one perfectly adequate reason for referring to Leningrad rather than to St. Peters burg is that the former is the city's name. It is difficult to think that one goes too far in calling a spade a spade when he speaks of a geographical spot by the name it has on the map. No reckless, revolutionary spirit is discoverable in the man who refers to a city by its current designation rather than by one dropped some years ago.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
OCT 26 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO DROP SOVIET NAME

BOSTON, Oct. 25.—Complaints made to trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated. Among those protesting was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn Society and brother of the late Curtis Guild, who was ambassador to Russia.

SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 31 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

"The supreme concert of the season" is the way one local enthusiast put it in speaking of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the armory Monday night, November 10, under the management of Ben Franklin. With such an orchestra of 104 men, under such leadership of Koussevitsky, it may be truthfully called "a supreme event" for no one could name a more perfect musical occasion. The seat sales open on Monday at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney company and at the Wallace company. There is little doubt but that the demand will be immense.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 30 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

On Saturday last at Symphony hall, Boston, music lovers of that city were thrown into such a state of excitement that they have not as yet recovered from it. This was caused at the concert of the Boston Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky broke the "no encore" rule that has held good for the last 43 years, in fact since the organization was founded. This will be particularly interesting to the host that will attend the concert of the orchestra at the State Armory, Monday evening, November 10, under the direction of Ben Franklin, because the number that caused the departure, Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bee," is to be played in that concert. In commenting on this departure at Boston, the Globe of that city said: "He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his band. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the hand clapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the 'Bumble Bee' was again in full flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

For the Schenectady concert the seat sales will open on Monday morning at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company and at the Barney Company, and mail orders, sent to Mr. Franklin at once, Cluett's will be filled before the public sale opens.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
OCT 29 1924

SYMPHONY BREAKS 40-YEAR PRECEDENT

A precedent of forty years standing was broken by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening at its concert in Symphony hall. For the first time in the history of the Orchestra a piece was played for the second time. The particular selection was "The Flight o the Bumble Bee" and at its close the applause and enthusiasm was so intense that Kousevitzky, conducting the orchestra, was recalled so often that finally tradition went by the boards and the selection was played again.

In Lowell next Sunday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play that selection as part of the brilliant program which has been planned for the occasion. The Orchestra is having a splendid season under the guiding gelius of the Russian conductor. It will not, however, be able to visit Lawrence this season. The Lowell Auditorium will doubtless be the Mecca on Sunday afternoon of local music lovers who wish to hear the great orchestra at its best.

The Lowell program:

Bach, C. P. E.: Concerto for Orchestra in D-major.
Berlioz Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.
Rachmaninov "Voclaise" (arranged for Orchestra by the composer).
Rimsky-Korsakov: "Rubinouchka" (Russian folk song).
Moussorgsky Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina".
Rimsky-Korsakov "The Flight of the Bumble Bee",—charzo from the opera "Tsar Saltan."
Bethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 57.
1. Allegro con brio
2. Andanta con moto
3. Allegro: trio
4. Allegro

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 26 1924

Leningrad, That Raised Mild Rumpus at Boston Symphony, Not Recognized by U.S.

The word "Leningrad" on a Boston Symphony Orchestra programme last week certainly stirred things up.

This form was substituted for the old name "Petrograd."

Because of the widespread interest in the case these new facts are of interest.

Which Is Correct?

Suppose we should dishonor the memory of George Washington by taking his name from the capital of the United States and replacing it with the name of some far from great man of today.

This would be the same sort of thing as it is to use Leningrad in place of Petrograd or St. Petersburg, says Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The many changes in name of the Russian city that was born St. Petersburg, matured as Petrograd and is dying as Leningrad, are no official concern of the United States State Department, according to Washington officials. As is well known, America has not recognized the Soviet government, and so has no official communication whatever with Russia. The only official Russian agent in this country is the financial agent of the Kerensky regime, who has his office in New York.

As Leningrad was Petrograd under Kerensky, it is Petrograd to the United States government, but privately, if the government wished any communications to go to the Russian capital, they would be addresed Leningrad.

For the Soviet government has issued notice that no mail addressed to Petrograd will be delivered. Hence if you do not wish your mail to be destroyed, it must be addressed Leningrad. What government mail does go to the changeling city is addressed to Leningrad.

Irish City Changed Name

Our State Deartment has nothing to say if a foreign city wishes to change its name. It is considered purely a domestic affair of the foreign government. When the Irish Free State decided that the name of Queenstown was entirely to British, and decreed that the port should be known as Cobh, the State Department here raised no objections, but after its recognition of the Irish Free State, acceded to that government's wishes in the matter.

The Swedish government has given notice that after Jan. 1, its capital, Christiania, shall be known as Oslo, because Christiania is too Danish for the sovereignty of Sweden. Without strenuous objection, the State Department, after Jan. 1, will address its Christiania mail to Oslo.

As for the use of private citizens in this country of the words Petrograd or Leningrad, it is merely a matter of individual taste.

Peter the Great, for whom Petrograd was named originally | Lenine, for whom Petrograd has been renamed by the Soviets

Where Name Came From

"St Petersburg—or Petrograd, as they called it during the World war—is a great monument to that great Russian, Peter the Great."

That is the emphatic rejoinder of Serge Koussevitsky, leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, when people ask whether he is in sympathy with calling the Russian capital by its Soviet name, Leningrad, which has been used in the notes in the first two Symphony programmes.

Mr. Koussevitsky protests at the thought that Lenin, late chief of the Soviets, should be considered as great a Russian as Peter, and his memory perpetuated by replacing Peter's name as the designation of the seat of the Russian government.

But a Soviet law takes every precaution to compel the use of the name Leningrad, not only by Russians but by foreigners dealing with that country.

This third name for the same city marks the third of three tremendous chapters in the history of Russia.

The second chapter was the change to Petrograd.

One of the last acts of Czar Nicholas II as a full-fledged autocrat was at the beginning of the World war, when he issued an imperial ukase, or direct decree to the nation, ordering that St. Petersburg be known from that time as Petrograd and that alone.

As his army clashed with the forces of Austria and Germany, a cry went up that German interests in Russia were exerting pressure. Strong suspicions were gossiped around, linking the Czarina with the propaganda, for she had been born a German princess. It is true that her presence had attracted many of her countrymen to Russia, and had secured favoring circumstances for their residence there.

Powerful German Faction

Also there was a powerful German faction descended from ancestors who had intrenched themselves in business and other pursuits in the old days of Peter and Catherine. They were rich and important. The war fanned flames of hate against them, the desire to rid the country of them, of their influence and their memory.

Every mention of the name St. Petersburg became obnoxious, because of the German-sounding termination, "burg." It did not matter that the name was over 200 years old. Nor did it count that the name was derived from the language of Holland, and not Germany. Since it had a German sound, it was best for it to go. And so the Czar decreed.

The new name, Petrograd, was thoroughly Russian. A great deal of importance was fastened upon it because of its symbolism, for Russians are fond of symbols. In speaking and writing Petrograd, they indicated their pride of national spirit and their anti-German sentiment.

Now we come to the first chapter in the history of the city.

"Father of His Country"

And the original naming of St. Petersburg, we discover, has something in common with the naming of Washington, D. C. For both capitals bear the names of men who were voted the title: "Father of His Country."

Peter had defeated Sweden, which, up to that time, had been a foremost military power. Following the treaty of Nystad, his victory was celebrated with a solemn thanksgiving in the Troista Cathedral in Petersburg. After this ceremony, the Czar went to the Senate. And to great acclaim the chancellor hailed him as:

"Father of the Fatherland, Peter the Great and Emperor of all Russia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOVERSVILLE
N. Y.
LEADER REPUBLICAN
OCT 31 1924

Boston Symphony to Play in Schenectady

Music lovers of Gloversville and Johnstown will be interested to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 instrumentalists, and said to be the finest body of instrumentalists on earth, will give a concert at the State Armory, Schenectady, Monday evening, November 10, and that the seat sale for the event will open Monday morning at the stores of Cluett & Sons, the Barney Company, and the Wallace Company, where mail and phone orders will be accepted in order to accommodate out-of-town patronage.

This concert will be the chief musical feature of the year in these parts, and it is interesting to note that the program of the event will be an exact duplicate of the concert at Boston one week ago when the orchestra and Koussevitzky were so successful that the "no encore" rule established 43 years ago, was broken for the first time.

Toronto
New Yorker
OCT 24 1924

RUSSIAN RUCTION

Boston, Oct. 28.

Political difficulties again are surrounding the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has a new conductor this year, Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Dr. Karl Muck provided the storm center for the orchestra during the World War.

Koussevitzky already has made his first appearance with the talented aggregation and because he referred to the former capital of Russia on the programs as Leningrad, unpleasantness ensued with its arrows directed toward the new conductor.

An editorial from a publication owned by Courtenay Guild, noted patron of music, shows the character of the criticism directed against the Russian. Mr. Guild wrote: "If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian victor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 30 1924

"Although encores are almost unknown at these concerts, they are not quite," he declares. "It was in Nikisch's reign that the first performance of the now familiar "Peer Gynt" suite was given.

"At the close of the thunderous last movement, which is supposed to depict the chasing of Peer Gynt by the mountain gnomes, the applause was so tumultuous and so insistent that Nikisch had the movement played over again. I speak from knowledge, for I was there.

"That was the first, and, I believe, the only Symphony concert encore until that of last Saturday night."

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

SYMPHONY STIRS BIG AUDIENCE

Serge Koussevitzky continued his policy of placing at least one novelty on the Symphony programs when he brought out for the first time in America Roussel's Symphony in B flat.

From a first hearing it is hard to understand the reason for all the excitement that this work caused when it was first produced in Paris some time ago. Some of the themes are interesting, particularly the first which, by the small compass of its intervals, is suggestive of Franck, under whose pupil, D'Indy, Roussel studied.

LACKED CONTRAST.

The work seemed too long, and did not have sufficiently contrasting material. Very likely a second hearing might cause this estimate to be revised. As it was, the symphony, coming after a remarkable performance of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," stirred the audience to only mild applause.

The second half of the program furnished considerable excitement. Taken entirely from Wagner's music, it included the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Siegfried Funeral Music from "Gotterdamerung" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

The effect of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting was astonishing. The music glowed. Approaching Wagner with the freshness that he brings to all compositions, the conductor made the Tannhauser music sound like real Bacchanalian frenzy, not like an exercise for the orchestra.

APPLAUSE DEAFENING.

Never has the funeral music been made to sound more majestic, more heroic, or more tragic. Those crashing chords almost shook the roof. At the close of this piece the applause was so great that the conductor made the orchestra rise to share it.

The same goes for the prelude to "The Master singers."

The work of the brass stood out in rich color and the strings had a sensuousness that was missing last year. Wagner's music is always a test for an orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitsky, the orchestra and the audience may relatively take their ease. No Prokofiev will spur them; no Roussel tax them. For novel number the conductor proposes Ravel's version for orchestra of Musorgsky's ten piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." They are impressions in tones, humorous, sardonic, fanciful, graphic. There are linking measures as well. The ingenuity and incisiveness of composer and transcriber go hand in hand. For the rest, Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," begins the program. The Symphony in G minor of Mozart's final years and Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Chaikovsky continue it. The Variations, seven in all, will be played for the first times in Boston.

On Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, at four o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will begin a new series of concerts for young people. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct, and Mr. Wallace Goodrich will "say a few words" about the chosen pieces. They are: Overture, Scherzo and March from Mendelssohn's incidental music to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Stravinsky's version for wind, brass and percussion instruments of the "Song of the Volga Bargemen," to be heard for the first times in Boston; the Canzonetta, played by Mr. Burgin, from Chaikovsky's Concerto for Violin; the Scherzo of the Bee from Rimsky-Korsakov's Opera, "Tsar Saltan"; the Minuet and the Round from d'Indy's Suite in the Olden Style; and the elder Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz. Adults, unless accompanied by children will not be admitted.

On Thusday evening in Sanders Theater at Harvard, the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitsky conducting, will continue its concerts in Cambridge. The program traverses Emmanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra; the Venusberg music from Wagner's "Tannhäuser"; the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; the Scherzo of the Bee from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan"; Brahms's Fourth Symphony—all from recent concerts in Boston.

Singers

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 1 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A great musical treat is expected in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for their celebrated new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be introduced to the Pittsburgh public for the first time. The Boston orchestra concerts will open the symphony season on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque. Two different programs will be given, as follows:

"Concerto for Orchestra in D Major ..... Bach, C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
"Overture to Egmont, Op. 84" ..... Beethoven
"Pictures at an Exhibition" ..... Moussorgsky
(Arranged by M. Ravel)
"Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98" ..... Brahms

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

"Symphony in G Minor" (Kochel No. 550) ..... Mozart
"Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky" ..... Arensky
Overture "The Roman Carnival" Op. 9 ..... Berlioz
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantchina" ..... Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" Scherzo ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
From the Opera, "Tsar Saltan"
"The Poem of Ecstasy" Op. 54 ..... Scriabin

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY
GAZETTE
OCT 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is expected that the armory will contain a large audience on Monday night, November 10, to welcome the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 instrumentalists, and to give special welcome to Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, whose success so far stamps him as one of the great masters of the day. Without in any way contrasting the appearance of the Boston Symphony with that of any other musical attraction to be presented, it may be said in all truth that the appearance of this orchestra and its eminent conductor will provide the finest musical treat that will be offered this season. Mail orders for seats, if sent to Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, will be filled before the opening of the public sales of seats that takes place on Monday at the stores of Cluett and Sons, Wallace Company and the Barney Company.

$150,000 A MILE

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 31 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Conservative Boston has gone wild over Serge Koussevitzky, the new leader of its world famous orchestra, the Boston Symphony, and all the evidence points to the fact that in this leader the organization has secured a conductor second to none before the public. His interpretations completely renew old compositions, he throws traditions to the winds, and gives full vent to his own ideas of the interpretations, and so far has been immensely successful. Columns have been given to him in every Boston paper, and a recent number of the New York Times gave a full page to his ability, ideas, interpretations, etc. That Schenectady is to have this orchestra here, under the leadership of such a great conductor, is a matter for congratulation, and it should mean a vast outpouring of music lovers from all over this territory.

The seat sales will open on Monday morning at the store of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company and the Barney Company, and no doubt there will be a large demand for tickets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
NOV 1 1924

Orchestral Concert in Montclair.

The most important of the concerts scheduled in this section during the coming month will be those employing the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, in a Symphony Concert for Young People in the Montclair High School Tuesday afternoon, November 25, and that to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course in the same hall Wednesday night, November 26.

176

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 1 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

A Musical Locomotive Comes to Town—Honegger's "Pacific, 231"

Last night at Carnegie Hall the Locomotive entered musical art for the first time in New York's experience, and great was the delight of all the grown-up little boys in the audience as Mr. Walter Damrosch, having driven the roaring, pounding, hurtling monster through the symphonic night, brought it grindingly to a triumphant stop beside the platform.

The music lover who follows the news of the concert world will not need to be told that this memorable occasion was the first publication hereabouts of Arthur Honegger's famous symphonic ode to that gigantic, iron-throated nightingale, the high-speed modern locomotive, with which Mr. Koussevitzky amused and stirred his Boston public three weeks ago for the first time in America. Mr. Damrosch's performance of the remarkable work was the first in New York, and the première was indeed a noteworthy one.

* * *

It has been told of Honegger, the gifted young French composer who first became prominent as one of the Parisian "Group of Six," that he has always been enamored of engines; that, from childhood, they had fascinated him—which, to be sure, was not particularly original of young Mr. Honegger.

It was once said of him by a friend that he likes to exhibit in his rooms a collection of drawings, designs, and the like, that he has accumulated—"all about locomotives. They stir in him lively sensations. Sooner or later, he hinted, he would translate them into music."

And that is what he has done. The score of his "Symphonic Movement," as he calls it, contains this preface:

"I have always had a passionate love for locomotives. For me they are like living creatures, and I love them as others love women or horses [which recalls disturbingly one of Mr. Ed Wynn's most celebrated anecdotes]. What I have sought to accomplish in this piece is not to imitate the noises of a locomotive, but rather to translate into music a visual impression and a feeling of physical joy. The music begins with an objective contemplation—the tranquil breathing of the machine in repose. Then follow the straining effort to start, the gathering speed, the progress from a lyric mood to the pathetic one of a three-hundred-ton train hurling itself through the night at a speed of one hundred and twenty miles an hour. As an example, I have chosen a locomotive of the 'Pacific' type (known as 231), used for heavy trains at high speed."

* * *

Those who may have expected, from this preparatory description, to find Monsieur Honegger indulging in a merely clever tour de force of imitative realism, or at best a witty jeu d'esprit, found themselves barking up the wrong tree. It is true that Monsieur Honegger seems to have had his tongue in his cheek when he disclaimed any intention to imitate the noises of a locomotive. That Paris reviewer who heard in the "hissing harmonics" of the violins a hint that the monster is getting up steam, and the clanking and groaning of the effort to start in the travailing of the basses, was not wholly fantastic. But what gives its distinction and its extraordinary impressiveness to the piece is the eloquence with which it communicates, through music of immense vitality and power, an imaginative concept and an emotional state.

* * *

This composition is not essentially the tone-picture of a concrete locomotive roaring and blazing and pounding through the night. Superficially it is that, of course, and a very witty and brilliant thing Monsieur Honegger makes of this aspect of it. But there is more in the music than that: there is the projection of an idealized vision of a marvelous modern world in which man has extended himself and his powers through muscles of steel and ganglia of copper and brass, has conquered time and space by his mechanical mastery of stupendous forces and the genius with which he has bent them to his imperious will. Monsieur Honegger's "Pacific," flaming joyously and clamorously through the night, sings a rhapsodic pæan in praise of the creative energy of the indomitable human soul, exulting in its limitless strength and mastering the tangible earth. It is this which makes Honegger's music so thrilling, so puissant, and so genuinely moving.

* * *

The score is admirable in facture. Honegger's handling of rhythmic and harmonic counterpoint, his sense of dynamic growth, his manipulation of instrumental planes and masses, is superbly confident and resourceful.

Arthur Honegger

Composer of "Pacific 231," the musical impression of a locomotive played for the first time here by the New York Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall

And when that barbaric song of triumph rises from the throats of the trombones and culminates in the massive slowing down of the rhythm which brings the jocund Titan to its goal, you will probably feel like concluding that Monsieur Honegger has pulled off something that is suspiciously like a contemporary masterpiece of humor and invention and imagination.

* * *

Mr. Damrosch and his men played the piece with gusto and virtuosity, and made an enormous hit with it. The conductor is entitled to much praise for his enterprise in securing the work for a first performance here, and it is good news that he is soon to play it again at the Symphony concerts—next Sunday afternoon, and at the following Thursday and Friday pair.

* * *

The rest of the program comprised the Fifth Symphony, Vaughn Williams's beautiful Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and an orchestral transcription by Bernardino Molinari of Debussy's gorgeous piano piece, "L'Isle Joyeuse." We prefer this music in its original form—it is a hundred times more effective in the keyboard version than in Molinari's ungratifying arrangement. The transcription is said to have been made "at the wish and with the approval of the composer in the last year of his life." It was published in 1923, when Debussy had been safely dead for five years.

A crowded house welcomed Mr. Damrosch and his admirable orchestra at the beginning of their new season.

Mischa-Leon's Recital

While Mr. Damrosch was preparing to unleash "Pacific" at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Mischa-Léon, a tenor from the Paris Opéra, who was born in Denmark of Spanish and Russian parentage and is said to have a dash of Persian in him, exhibited an uncommonly interesting and unconventional program and a vivid interpretive style at his first American appearance as a concert singer. The distinguished audience which he had drawn to Aeolian Hall applauded him with progressive cordiality as he warmed to his task, and left him in no doubt concerning their pleasure in his power of dramatic indication, in his expressive singing—which is at its best when he does not force his voice—and in his abundant supply of temperament.

Mr. Mischa-Léon sang songs by Albert Roussel, Henri Busser (now one of the conductors at the Paris Opéra), Fauré, Rhené-Baton, Laparra, Thomas Dunhill, Roger Quilter, Granville Bantock, Josef Holbrooke, Hans Hermann, Erich Wolff, Strauss, Hugo Wolf, Sigurd Lie, Grieg and others. It was delightful to pick up the program of a song recital from which the hackneyed standbys of a thousand sheep-minded singers were sternly excluded.

Mr. Mischa-Léon has a sure and sensitive instinct for the dramatic texture of a song, and he communicates it potently—with less restraint of gesture and bodily expression than our too chaste concert halls are accustomed to, but always with warm and communicative imagination.

Mr. Walter Golde conferred upon the singer the benefit of his admirable skill and taste as an accompanist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 1 1924

Serge Kussevitzky, Orchestra Leader

Christian Science Monitor Nov 1

Mr. Koussevitzky as Wagnerian Conductor

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Weber.....Overture to "Oberon"
Roussel.....Symphony in B flat, Op. 23
Wagner..Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser"
Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods"
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Roussel's symphony was played for the first time in America. So important a work may scarcely be judged by a single hearing and only first impressions (not always true ones) may be given; yet it may be stated with certainty that this symphony is not one to be lightly dismissed as merely another example of outlandish modernity. Nothing would be further from the truth, for it is at once apparent that this is music nobly conceived, music whose primary purpose is not to tickle the ear but rather to stir the deeper emotions. Like all music thus conceived, while it remains more or less unfamiliar, it at first repels, although its greatness and nobility are at once felt.

Thus yesterday afternoon there were many pages which seemed difficult and forbidding which will undoubtedly become clearer to the understanding with further acquaintance, for once again let it be stated that this is not ingratiating music. It would be possible to dwell at length on the more salient features of this work, its distinctive orchestral coloring, the rhythmical ingenuity of the second movement in particular, its real harmonic originality and withal the effect of a strong musical individuality which it impresses upon the hearer. It would be possible to cite striking and moving passages—the middle section of the second movement, a the closing measures, yet all t would give but a pale idea of the lofty grandeur of the work a whole.

The concert was one of sharp contrasts. It has never been our good (or ill) fortune to hear We r's Overture to "Oberon" played it was yesterday. New wine ma not be put into old bottles with im ity, and while everyone will rea ad- mit that familiar works l this overture do not deserve th tereo- typed interpretations fr which they too ofte uffer, yet there is a limit beyond ich it is unsafe to go.

On the ot hand, Mr. Koussevitzky's play of the Wagner selections was nqualifiedly superb. He succeeded evoking in the concert room th tmosphere which it has often seen only the surroundings of the t ater could lend to this music. A yet he was not theatrical. The se uous music of the Venusberg, the ignant funeral music and the noble Prelude to "The Meistersingers" were each given their true value, and this without a tinge of exaggeration. Never did the genius of Wagner shine more brightly, and it is safe to predict, never will the unusual qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky as a conductor show to better advantage than they did yesterday in these pieces. Inspired by the conductor, the orchestra fairly outdid itself, and never has it played with greater warmth or beauty of tone. The performance of Roussel's Symphony, too, deserves mention, for, although the skill of orchestra and conductor in this music were less apparent to the general auditor, they were none the less present in the highest degree.

S. M.

NOTED EVENT IN MUSIC

Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct Boston Symphony in Schenectady

Monday evening, Nov. 10, at the state armory, Schenectady, Ben Franklin will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 instrumentalists in a concert that will be remembered by all in attendance as one of the most interesting and enjoyable events ever had in the Albany radius. Critics of long standing and of known reputation claim that the orchestra has never before played as it is playing this year, and they give all credit and praise to Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who began his engagement this season.

He is said to be a marvel in interpretation; he is the soul of generosity, and he gives full credit for his success to the wonderful orchestra that he now has under his command. An evidence of his success was shown in the Boston Symphony concert at Boston one week ago to-night. For the first time in the history of the organization, more than 43 years, the "No encore" rule was broken, and the orchestra repeated a number. This broke all traditions of the orchestra, and it gives an idea of the Koussevitzky ability and personality.

He is a program builder par excellence, and his program always contain novelties, as well as the well known classics. For instance, the program for the Schenectady concert will include:

Variations on a theme of Tchaikovsky, Arensky; "Vocalize" (arranged for the orchestra by composer) Rachmaninov; "Dubinouchka," (Russian Folk Song), Rimsky-Korsakov; Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, from the Opera "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakov.

Incidentally, it may be noted that it was "The Flight of the Bee" mentioned above that broke the "no e core" rule at Boston.

Seats for the concert may be secu at Cluett and Sons', Schenectad may be ordered of Mr. Franklin Chestnut street, Albany. Undo a large number from Albany tend the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 1 1924

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, nearly a month away, is already sold out, indicating the public's interest in the orchestra's new conductor, Koussevitzky. It sounds like old times for the Bostonians. And the contract of Dr. Stokowski, the Philadelphia Orchestra's meteoric leader, has been extended to ten years, proving they do not always sleep in Philly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
~~POST~~

NOV 1 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY IS COMING

Conductor to Make Debut Here When Boston Orchestra Opens Symphony Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussezitzky, will be introduced to the Pittsburgh public for the first time when the symphony season opens on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque. Two different programs will be given, as follows:

FRIDAY NIGHT.
Concerto for Orchestra in D Major.....Bach, C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
Overture to Egmont, Op. 84.....Beethoven
Pictures at an Exhibition (Arr. by M. Ravel).....Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98..Brahms
SATURDAY AFTERNOON.
Symphony in G Minor (Kochel No. 550) Mozart
Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky.....Arensky
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.....Berlioz
Prelude to the opera, "Khovantchina".....Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" Scherzo from the opera, "Tsar Saltan".....Rimsky-Korsakov
The Poem of Ecstasy, Op. 54N.....NScriabin

PAGE TEN

SYMPHONY IN 4TH CONCERT

Overture to "Oberon" Brilliantly Given—Roussel Work New

PERFORMANCE TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its fourth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised these pieces: Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Roussel Symphony B flat (first time in America); Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser;" funeral music for Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

For a good many years the conductors thought it necessary, or safe—the words with them was perhaps synonymous—to play each season the three chief overtures of Weber, as they thought it behooved them to perform at least four symphonies by Beethoven. As a result the performance of these overtures was often perfunctory and pedestrian. Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday showed the audience that, in spite of familiarity, the overture to "Oberon" is beautiful and brilliant. Never within recollection has the fairy music been so exquisite. From Oberon's horn, a horn 'of Elfland faintly blowing," to the crash that announces the change of mood and pace. In the Allegro, the theme first announced by the clarinet was for once sung, not breathlessy hurried through, but as an aria with full liberty given to the singer for expression. In the same way the joyous outburst of Rezia's peroration was freed from the banality, not to say vulgarity, often attributed to it by literal, matter-of-fact, metronomic conductors.

Roussel's Symphony was produced at a Pasdeloup concert, Paris, in 1922. The work was courteously but adversely criticised. We are informed that a friend of Roussel showed the score of the modest and discouraged composer to Mr. Koussevitzky, who became interested in it and produced it at one of his concerts in the fall of the next year, when its reception by the public was very different; other performances were equally successful.

In the Fifties and the Sixties, when a good New Englander wished to prove that he had an artistic taste, he hung upon the walls of his parlor a series of engravings by Cole, representing "The Voyage of Life," in which a man beginning with innocent childhood encounters as a youth and in maturity temptations, knows the peril of shoals and rapids, but finally, in his old age, reaches calm water and a peaceful end. These pictures were proudly shown with shells on the mantelpiece, mourning wreaths, a set of ivory chessmen brought by Uncle Ebenezer, the sea captain, from the Orient, while a silver plated ice water pitcher with goblets stood on the sideboard in the dining room.

Roussel provides an argument, not unlike this series of engravings, for his symphony. His music is intended to portray (1) the enthusiastic ardor of youth; (2) joys, then deep impressions of a rather sentimental nature; (3) sorrow, bitterness, revolt, "at last peacefulness in the serenity that raises man above the passions."

The introduction, the composer informs us, is only a sort of preface It is peculiarly gloomy and mysterious, as if hinting at Adam's fall; man born in sin and reared in corruption. The youth is apparently lost in "devious coverts of dismay." But suppose no explanation of the composer's purpose were given? The music can hardly be said to be a literal and minute commentary on the announced thesis, except for those who are not content with music unless an explanation allows them to dilate with the proper emotion. They may easily find joyous moments, sad moments, a dramatic revolt; at the end serenity, and these pages are truly beautiful. But what shall be said of the symphony as absolute music? For the work cannot be called program music after the manner of Liszt and the later composers who turn poems, pictures, legends, heroic or pathetic figures into symphonic poems.

There is no doubt about the honesty, the high aims, the musical equipment of Roussel, but this symphony, in spite of many impressive pages, some of them beautiful as those we have mentioned, is lacking in clearness of design and firmness of structure. Themes that are not striking in themselves are lost in the development through a too painstaking search after details that too often obscure the main ideas and do not enrich them. It might also be said that much of the work is diffuse and on the whole too episodic.

Life that is worth living is full of contrasts. One misses relieving contrasts in this symphony, especially contrasts in color. The prevailing tone is rather gray, drab. For one that has known the Orient and been inspired by it for other compositions, Roussel is here surprisingly without sensuous warmth in thematic material, in his use of it, and in the orchestral dress.

The production of the symphony yesterday was evidently a labor of love on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky. The music appeals to him; he believes in it; the performance was one to do it full justice.

The final pages of the symphony are intended to portray man raised above the passions. Wagner's Bacchanale that followed was not intended, like tragedy, to purify them. The performance was a glowing, gorgeous one, exciting in the Bacchantic frenzy, sensuous in the measures that should accompany the sight of the three Graces, Leda with the swan, and at last Tannhaeuser alone with Venus. And the performance of Siegfried's music and the overture to "The Mastersingers" was equally memorable.

After the first beats of the drum in the funeral music, Mr. Koussevitzky stopped the orchestra. He was evidently annoyed by the coughing and barking in the hall. Was the silent reproof heeded? Not at all. The intrepid coughers continued, probably thinking that the drum was not beaten to Mr. Koussevitzky's taste.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Mozart, Symphony, G minor; Arensky, Variations for strings on a theme of Tchaikovsky's (first time in Boston); Moussorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel (first time in America).

NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 1 1924

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

New York Symphony Opens Season.

The audience which attended the first concert of the season by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall, had been informed in advance, in no uncertain terms, that Arthur Honegger's symphonic movement "Pacific 231" would be heard for the first time in this city, and that the piece (parenthesis and heavy type) was a "musical description of a locomotive rushing across a continent at midnight." It would have taken another line to have added "at top speed," but Mr. Damrosch saw to that in the performance.

The methods followed, appropriately enough, in this announcement, attracted numbers of the curious who came in to hear Honegger's piece and promptly left when it was over, though there were such masterpieces as Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Vaughan Williams's Fantasie on a Theme of Thomas Tallis—music of haunting loveliness and imagination—and d'Indy's superb "Istar" variations, also to be heard. They did not matter. The people wanted to hear the "locomotive," and even blasé critics, troubled by many concerts, did leg work so that they might arrive on time to describe the much advertised tone-picture to an expectant public.

This is the piece previously introduced by Serge Kussewitsky in Europe and America, of which the composer himself remarked that he had always loved locomotives passionately, "as others love women or horses"; that he wished to convey "not the noise of an engine, but the visual impression and physical sensation of it." And so there is the suggestion of the monster in repose, just breathing; then the start, in heavy, chunking chords low in the orchestra; then the gradual acceleration, and generation of a fragment of joyous song. This is as successful a balance of realistic and genuinely musical ideas as we have encountered in the concert room. The suggestion of it is unmistakable, and is accomplished with expert technic, with a well-developed harmonic idiom and a thorough knowledge and ingenious employment of the orchestra. But we have more than the imitation of a noise. We have music, youthful, energetic, full of laughter. The units of rhythmic energy cohere and develop in the most organic manner to the moment when great smashing chords bring the end.

The composition need not be taken portentously or as the discovery of a new phase of art; it is rather a highly amusing "jeu d'esprit," and a sign of perhaps the healthiest, most genuine and optimistic spirit of that group of composers who formerly advertised themselves as the Paris "Six." From this group Honegger has swung off at a tangent, in a manner that betokens a talent probably more sincere and original than those which formerly surrounded it. One listened to his score, and could not help remembering the stocky figure, the boyish face, the laughter of the man as he talked of everything in heaven or earth on a street corner one midnight last Summer in Paris.

"Pacific 231" was not the only novel offering of an uncommonly interesting program. Mr. Damrosch played, also for the first time here, Bernardino Molinari's orchestration of the piano piece of Debussy, "L'Isle Joyeuse." It is a good instrumentation, keeping very closely to the original text, yet coloring it skillfully and in the Debussyan manner; and it is beautiful music, a little sensual, in the Watteau manner; music that might have been wafted from the island of Cytherea.

The performance of the symphony was in Mr. Damrosch's familiar vein, distinguished by his love and native enthusiasm for the immortal score and by a frequent absence of nuance, crispness of attack, finish of detail. He took certain passages at his own sweet tempi, which he has always done, and doubtless always will. The tempo at the opening of Vaughan Williams's Fantasie, which is a little too long for perfection of form, but which we would fain were an hour or two longer—it is so beautiful and of the "moyen age"—was faster than we have had from other conductors. The same thing was true of the earlier pages of Honegger's piece, as compared with readings of Mr. Kussewitsky heard by the writer in Paris and Boston. The Damrosch performance was, in fact, somewhat in the circus manner. But a man runs a great risk when he writes a symphonic movement about a locomotive. He invites sensationalism and perhaps he himself is not wholly innocent of it.

SATURDAY MO

SYMPHONY'S CONDUCTOR WAGNERIAN

Reveals Unthought of Beauties and Frenzies in Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Mr. Koussevitzky there may be no trifling.

At the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, an audience left emotionally spent by an unbelievably eloquent performance of the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser," stirred restlessly in its seats. Next upon the programme stood the "Funeral Music" of Siegfried, and the kettle-drummer, Mr. Ritter, began his ominous drum tappings. Now, it is Mr. Koussevitzky's wish that these solemn beats should be all but inaudible; felt rather than heard. They sounded; but the rustling of the audience continued. Straightway, Mr. Koussevitzky dropped his baton—and not until there was absolute silence did he recommence the music.

GLORIFIES WEBER

On the programme of yesterday stood three pieces originally announced for Mr. Koussevitzky's first concert in Boston: The Bacchanale and the "Funeral Music" aforementioned, and the Overture to "Oberon." To them was now added the Symphony in B flat major by Albert Roussel, played for the first time in America, and, for exultant ending, the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

No doubt the ultra-conservative are now saying, and will say after this evening's concert, that Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Weber's Overture was mannered, that in the introduction the volume of tone was subdued beyond all reasonableness, that the second theme of the overture proper was dragged and sentimentalized, and that sundry other "liberties" were taken.

Poetic and Brilliant

Yet is not this introduction music of fairyland, and did it not sound yesterday as from another world, a world of magic and unreality? And is not Huon's air a romantic melody, though conductor after conductor jigs through it and so deprives it of all emotional significance?

No, good friends, Mr. Koussevitzky no more distorted Weber than two weeks ago he distorted Beethoven. Rather he has glorified them both. That which Bruno Walter at a symphony concert of two years ago did for the Overture to "Euryanthe," Mr. Koussevitzky did yesterday for the Overture to "Oberon," and the audience applauded to the echo a rarely poetic, strongly brilliant performance. Again, let it be said that in Mr. Koussevitzky's hands no music, it would seem, can sound hackneyed.

Difficult to Hear

Difficult to play, difficult to conduct and difficult to hear is the Symphony of Roussel that yesterday followed these Weberian fancies. Even for the practised, sympathetic and open-minded listener this tremendously concentrated, often austere, music presents many a problem. No doubt for long it will be caviare to the general, yet it seemed yesterday that France has here given us another symphonic masterpiece.

And as in their own days the Symphony of Cesar Franck and the First and Second Symphonies of d'Indy defied precedent and tradition and baffled audiences and critics, so does Roussel's Symphony break for itself new paths and prompt upon the one hand protests and on the other words of high praise

In composing this Symphony which establishes him beyond questiton as a force in contemporary music, Roussel has challenged those who hold that the larger instrumental forms are outmoded even while he has reminded us that significant music in these forms can never be a re-working of familiar formulae. And particularly does he offer a rebuke to the flippancies and the fooleries of certain of his younger compatriots, the clownings of Milhaud and the studied infantilism of Poulenck.

Music of Deep Feeling

From the ouset Mr. Koussevitzky has befriend Roussel's Symphony, and one may safely say that in it he is all-revealing of the composer's purposes. Near to being half-hearted and perfunctory was the applause bestowed upon the piece yesterday afternoon, yet Mr. Koussevitzky that he has played in the consciousness that he has played for us music that, however perplexing and formidable at first blush, is music of deep feeling, of frequent lyrical beauty and of architectural strength, music that must ultimately find for itself an established place in the orchestral repertory.

As has already been said, the performance of the Bacchanale yesterday was one of superb frenzy and of suffusing beauty, a performance such as in all liklihood no Boston audience had ever heard before. Turning then to the funeral music, Mr. Koussevitzky likewise exalted and transfigured that stupendous page, lifted it to the plane of epic lamentation, while no less remarkable in its own way was the performance of the "Meistersinger" Prelude.

Once more a great Wagnerian conductor is among us.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
NOV 1 1924

THE PROLOGUE

News and views of music and musicians.

By MARY M. HOWARD.

The familiar works which Mr. Koussevitzky will include in his Boston Symphony orchestra programme on Thursday evening, November 13th, in Elmwood Music hall, will be the Tannhauser overture and Beethoven's fifth symphony, respectively the opening and closing numbers. Between these there will be a list of most interesting Russian numbers, beginning with Variations on a theme of Tschaikowsky, by Arensky. Rachmaninoff will be represented by Vocalises, which he has arranged for orchestra. This composition, which is wordless, was sung here a year ago by Nina Koschetz, with the Detroit Symphony orchestra. Rachmaninoff favors songs without words. In his opera, Francesca da Rimini, there is a chorus of specters that use no words, but portray their emotions by an undulating vocal line sung at times to the syllable Ah, and sometimes with closed lips. There are two Rimsky-Korsakoff numbers and the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera Khovantschina. This opera has for its subject the conflict between old and new Russia at the end of the seventeenth century. The composer died before the work was completed and it was finished and orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The prelude is descriptive of daybreak over Moscow, the curtain rising upon the Red Square in the Kremlin, with the sun gilding the church domes and the bells ringing for early matins. It is said to be as intensely national in feeling as anything in Russian music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BLOOMINGTON, ILL.
NOV 1 1924

Important Events Among Musicians

Boston has not yet recovered from the shock of discovering the word "Leningrad" upon the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor, was made the bearer of the blame by some followers of the orchestra. This he most emphatically denied. He declared, "I would be the last to wish to honor Lennin and Trotzky. I have left my country because of them and the terrific things they have done. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money and it is all gone—they took it from me. I could not understand why the capitol city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programs of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak of it to any but my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends. I hope I shall never again see that word in the programs of the Boston Symphony." Courtney Guild, put the spark to the tinder which resulted in the vehement protests, in an editorial in his weekly newspaper. the Commercial Bulletin. He protests particularly, the use of the word in referring to past glories, "Not once only, but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear on the first program of the season, and while there may be some excuse for using the name for the city today, what possible justification can be offered for stating that a brilliant musician who died in 1873, was a pupil of the 'Leningrad conservatory?'" The officers and the trustees of the orchestra denied any knowledge of how the word happened to be used, and the conclusion has been reached that some "stickler" for geographical accuracy was responsible for the use of the new name for St. Petersburg, or Petrograd.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOVERSVILLE
N. Y.
EADER REPUBLICAN
NOV 1 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT AT SCHENECTADY KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTING

Music lovers of Gloversville and Johnstown will be interested to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 instrumentalists, and said to be the finest body of instrumentalists on earth, will give a concert at the State Armory, Schenectady, Monday evening, November 10th, and that the seat sales for the event will open Monday morning at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney company, and the Wallace company, where mail and phone orders will be accepted in order to accommodate out of town patronage.

This concert will be the chief musical feature of the year in these parts, and it is interesting to note that the program of the event will be an exact duplicate of the concert at Boston one week ago tonight when the orchestra and Koussevitzky were so successful that the "no encore" rule established 43 years ago, was broken for the first time. Critics of long standing and of well known repute stated that the Boston Symphony has never played as well as it is playing this season, and they give all credit to the new conductor, Koussevitzky, who in turn gives all credit to the wonderful orchestra that he has at his command.

The Schenectady concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin, well known in this section, and who has a reputation for presenting only the very best attractions possible to secure.

Read The Morning Herald Classified

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
NOV 1 1924

Boston Symphony to Give Concert at Schenectady

Amsterdam music lovers will be largely in evidence at the State armory, Schenectady, Monday evening, November 10, for at that time Ben Franklin will present the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 instrumentalists, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization who began his engagement this season. This is an event of events musically speaking and to the enjoyment of the occasion will be the added interest of seeing Koussevitzky conduct, an event that cannot be too importantly considered. This eminent leader has already brought the Boston orchestra to such a state of efficiency that well known critics claim that it is now the finest body of instrumentalists before the public here or abroad. At Boston he has the town wild over his ability, and his success has been so great that the "no encore" rule established 43 years ago, was broken for the first time at a concert in Boston last Saturday night. Incidentally it may be noted the number that caused the tumult will be played at the Schenectady concert.

The seat sale for the Schenectady concert will open on Monday morning at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney company, and the Wallace company, and for the accommodation of out-of-town patronage, mail and phone orders for seats will be accepted and filled

UNION
NOV 1 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company and the Barney Company, on Monday morning, the seat sales will open for the concert of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the State Armory, Schenectady, Monday night, November 10, under the management of Ben Franklin. That there will be a great demand is a safe prediction for the enthusiasm over the coming appearance of the Bostonians, with their wonderful conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is marked, and interests music lovers for miles around, this engagement being understood to be the only one of the orchestra in either Schenectady or Albany this season.

Eminent critics of long standing hold that never before has the Boston orchestra played so well as it is playing thtis year, and they give all credit for the achievement to Serge Koussevitzky, the newly engaged conductor. And it is interesting to note that he, in turn, gives the credit to the wonderful band at his command, certainly a happy condition. Also, it is well to note that Schenectady is to have the incidental program as was given by the orchestra one week ago tonight at Boston when the long established rule of "no encores" was broken.

To accommodate out of town patronage, mail and phone orders will be accepted for seats at the sales opening Monday, and it is well to remember that the concert will not begin until half-past eight on account of the Walter de la Mare lecture at 7 o'clock at Union College.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 1 1924

LOCOMOTIVE SYMPHONY PLAYED

Damrosch Gives New York a Chance to Hear Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231."

The Parisian coterie of young composers known as the "Groupe les six" have, like Richard Strauss before them, learned the trick of reclame well enough to make it the eighth of the lively arts. The late P. T. Barnum would certainly have folded them one and all to his breast with unction. But unfortunately their press agentry is enormously better than their music. This was borne in on one perhaps more forcibly than ever at the opening concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night when the newest gimcrackery of Arthur Honegger, a "locomtive symphony," failed to click, as that inestimable weekly, Variety, would put it.

Mr. Honegger is, or was, one of the "Six"—for they are apparently no longer banded together except loosely. His piece about a locomotive is a "symphonic movement," for full—very full—orchestra, and is called "Pacific 231." Sergei Kussevitzky introduced it in America three weeks ago as part of his own introduction as the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra. It was supposed that he would be the first to introduce it here also, but Mr. Damrosch stole the Russian's thunder by giving it a first local performance ahead of him.

The piece had caused a great deal of talk in advance of its performance here, and it drew a substantial addition to the usual subscription crowd last night. But it was enormously disappointing.

According to Mr. Honegger, this music represented his "passionate love" of locomotives, for he says he has the same feeling for them that other men have for women, or horses. It rather made one wonder what his own feeling for women must be. For we must say that we found this "Pacific 231" both impotent and childish.

THE PUERILE AND IMPOTENT.

We have no quarrel with any of the modernist composers over their atonalities or polytonalities, their harmonic cacophonies or their lack of melody—over any of their ideas for new forms of expression. We concede cheerfully that a composer may write tremendous music without any melody at all. But we do hold him to the doing of what he sets out to do—the expression in whatever way he chooses, of the thing he seeks to express.

Mr. Honegger says his "Pacific 231" expresses the romantic aspect of a great locomotive speeding through the night at seventy miles an hour. To us it held merely the most puerile suggestion of the great, powerful, throbbing force that a locomotive is and was wholly impotent to arouse the subjective, romantic notion that he had in mind—that anyone has had at one time or another after a long and safe overnight train journey.

The only time during the six minutes the composition lasted that we got any impression, even feebly comparable to Mr. Honegger's subject, was in the orchestral din of the finale, and this was merely the association of noise with noise. Last night's audience didn't seem to be any more stirred over Mr. Honegger's piece than we were.

Mr. Damrosch's programme otherwise held the C minor symphony of Beethoven, played with a workaday fervor: Ralph Vaughn-Williams's fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Debussy's "L'isle joyeuse" as orchestrated by Bernardo Molinari, conductor of the Augusteum concerts in Rome (its first performance here) and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar." The Debussy piece is a beautiful trifle, and its instrumentation is uncannily Debussyan. The quite wondrous Vaughn-Williams fantasia was all but spoiled by a halting performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
NOV 1 1924

CONCERT SERIES TO START SOON

A splendid list of soloists is announced for the coming series of five Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 30, Feb. 24, and April 21, and although the main interest naturally centres in the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who many consider the most brilliant this orchestra has ever had, the artists who are to assist at the Providence series will undoubtedly add greatly to the importance of the concerts.

The name of Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto, is associated with the best days of Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera Company, and the Boston Opera Company, likewise with the principal opera hous Europe. The magnificent range and color of her voice, and her fine inteligence have made equally notable her recent appearances in concert.

Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, has long been esteemed in Europe, but until last season he has been known only by name in America. His two recitals in Carnegie hall, New York, were probably as much discussed as those of any new-coming pianist. Borovsky appeared in Paris under Serge Koussevitzky's baton in 1921.

Last season, Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, returned to his own country with highest opinion of Europe to commend him to us. Roland Hayes's many recitals and his appearances with his orchestra were the final confirmation of his greatness.

Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist, first came to this country in 1921, when his playing attracted a great deal of musical interest, and placed him with the best of the numerous geniuses of the violin who have come from his part of the world. Kochanski was one of the most applauded of the seasons soloists with this orchestra in Boston.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
NOV 1 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY IN WAGNER EXCERPTS

Nov 1 — Globe

New Symphony Leader Surpasses Himself

Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in excerpts from the music dramas of Wagnear, and surpassed himself. His Beethoven and his Brahms have been remarkably vivid and intense. His Wagner yesterday was superb. So was a magical performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture. The modern novelty, Roussel's Symphony in B flat, proved disappointing, despite some effective passages.

The "Funeral Music of Siegfried" and the prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg" represents Wagner's genius at its highest point, as the world has long since agreed. Koussevitzky condensed the whole passion of "The Dusk of the Gods" as Wagner conceived the drama, into the measures of the music that mourns for Siegfried. Every phase had its full value of light and shade, every note was surcharged with the keenest emotion. Even Dr Muck's well remembered performance illustrated no more perfect a blend of intensity and accuracy.

The "Meistersingers'" prelude is one of the most gorgeous bits of musical tapestry in existence. Koussevitzky brought out the color in every thread of the polyphony. He remembered, and made his hearers remember with him, the dramatic values in the comedy foreshadowed by the music of the prelude. He, as is his wont, grasped the large outlines of the piece without slurring over a single detail. So to transfigure one of the most familiar numbers in the orchestral repertory that a performance of it is an event to the most callous of listeners is the height of a conductor's achievement.

And Koussevitzky did not seek freakish "new readings." He is not a man who needs to force originality, to gain a hearing, but one whose authority is instantly and always felt.

It was hard to see why the detached fragment of the first act of "Tannhauser," Paris version, was offered without the overture. Not all Koussevitzky's eloquence could make this bit of the "Bacchanale" seem coherent or significant torn thus from its context.

Weber's "Oberon" overture is as hackneyed these days as Tennyson's "horns of elfland faintly blowing." Koussevitzky yesterday made the listener realize what both Weber and Tennyson really were driving at, the magic of fairyland.

Roussel has been a pupil of d'Indy, some of whose musical methods and idioms he retains in his symphony. This symphony lacks the unsuccessful striving for color of his "Rosy City" heard here two years ago. If the unresolved secondary seventh chords and the clashes of harmony incidental to the writing of a learned contrapuntist were exercised this symphony would savor of banality. The themes are not memorable. The development of them is more ingenious than inevitable. The scherzo is rather pretty, and there are interesting moments in the other movements. The final philosophical apotheosis is unconvincing. Koussevitzky did his obvious best to vitalize music which refused stubbornly to be vital.

Next week Beethoven's "Egmot" overture, Mozart's G minor Symphony, some variations by Arensky, and Ravel's orchestral version of Musorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition" fill the program. P. R.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
NOV 1 1924

New York, Nov 1.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston — which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Boy residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He was taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

PIERRE V R. KEY.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honnager symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to tho composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia orchestra patros, who have placed metaphorically no a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

Alma Gluck Returns.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
NOV 1 - 1924

New York, Nov 1.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston — which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Boy residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He was taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honnager symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to tho composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia orchestra patros, who have placed metaphorically no a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

Alma Gluck Returns.

PIERRE V R. KEY.

PAWTUCKET
R. I.
TIMES
NOV 1 - 1924

IT becomes evident that Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, coming to Elmwood Music hall, Thursday evening, November 13, under local management of Bessie Bellanca, stands not in awe of tradition. It has been a cherished precedent of the Boston Symphony for 43 years, virtually a law, that encores are prohibited. But in the third concert of the series in Symphony hall, Boston, October 17, the iconoclastic Russian threw precedent to the winds and answered applause with an encore. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," according to the Boston Post, was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelievable virtuosity of the orchestra. "The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitzky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his orchestra. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the hand-clapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee' was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra." The "Bumble Bee" is one of the numbers included in the program which Koussevitzky will present in Buffalo.

The same evening, the orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership gave Beethoven's 5th Symphony, which also will be given at the coming visit here of the orchestra. There was considerable curious anticipation of this event as word had come from Europe where Koussevitzky has been conductor of the Moscow orchestra and a virtuoso whose daring has become a legend in musical Europe, that this conductor interpreted the classics very much in his own way, causing angry protest from certain conservatives and worshippers of tradition. His Boston audience, however, found no cause for complaint. Koussevitzky convinced his hearers that they need have no fears of distortion of the classics or unwarrantable extravagance of accent. The critics of the Boston press were united in their praise of Koussevitzky's eloquence and extraordinary rhythmic vitality. In the Boston Evening Transcript, H. T. Parker wrote: "Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky laid the hand of power [illegible] who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. At will, as in the transition from scherzo to finale, he held it almost in suspensive rustle. For it, he phrased, as by a human voice, the songful measures of the andante. At every turn, the conducor was master of line, progress and accent."

Boston Symphony

A splendid list of soloists is announced for the coming series of five Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 20, Feb. 24 and April 21, and although the main interest naturally centres in the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who many consider the most brilliant this orchestra has ever had, the artists who are to assist at the Providence series will undoubtedly add greatly to the importance of the concerts.

The name of Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto, is associated with the best days of Hammerstein's Manhattan opera company, and the Boston opera company, likewise with the principal opera houses of Europe. The magnificent range and color of her voice, and her fine intelligence have made equally notable her recent appearances in concert.

Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, has long been esteemed in Europe, but until last season he has been known only by name in America. His two recitals in Carnegie Hall, New York, were probably as much discussed as those of any new-coming pianist. Borovsky appeared in Paris under Serge Koussevitzky's baton in 1921.

Last season, Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, returned to his own country with highest opinion of Europe to commend him to us. Roland Hayes' many recitals and his appearances with this orchestra were the final confirmation of his greatness.

Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist, first came to this country in 1921, when his playing attracted a great deal of musical interest, and placed him with the best of the numerous geniuses of the violin who have come from his part of the world. Kochanski was one of the most applauded of the season's so-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 1 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S VISIT NOV. 13 AROUSES INTEREST

It becomes evident that Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra coming to Elmwood Music hall, Thursday evening, November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca, is a smasher of traditions. It has been a cherished precedent of the Boston sympony for forty-three years, virtually a law, that encores are prohibited. But in the third concert of the series in Symphony hall, Boston, on October 17 the iconoclastic Russian threw precedent to the winds and answered applause with an encore. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," according to the Boston Post, was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelievable virtuosity of the orchestra. "The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitzky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his orchestra. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the hand-clapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee" was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. "The Bumble Bee" is one of the numbers included in the program which Koussevitzky will present in Buffalo.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop No. 230 Delaware avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
NOV 1 1924

Honegger's Joy Ride.

Walter Damrosch has now done for Sergei Koussevitzky exactly what his revered father, the late Dr. Leopold Damrosch, did once for Theodore Thomas. Today it is Honegger's "Pacific 231;" then it was Brahm's C minor symphony. But what it is or was is not the thing that matters. The important fact is that the Damrosch family always does it first!

The season's opening concert of the New York Symphony, in Carnegie Hall, last evening, introduced to New York that same locomotive piece by Arthur Honegger which Mr. Koussevitzky served up to Boston earlier in October, but has not yet had the chance to present to New York. Whether or not he will do so now remains to be seen. Mr. Damrosch promises several more trial runs of "Pacific 231" before he lays it off for the year.

Honegger, as we all know now, had a boyish passion for locomotives. In "Pacific 231" he says it is not the "noise of an engine," but the "visual impression," and "the physical sensation of it" that he seeks to express. Still, the composition heard last night is essentially onomatopoetic. It really does sound a good deal like a railway engine functioning, when it doesn't sound like that pre-railway, prehistoric "Consecration of Spring" which was more than a nine days' wonder here last winter.

The visual part one got at moments from the rotary bowing of the fiddlers, and there were times when you could feel the train careen as, scraping and screeching, it rounded a curve. "Pacific 231" is an enormously clever piece, and as precise and solid in the workmanship as the giant of the rails that it commemorates. But, so much said, what of it? Having heard it once and duly admired, would anybody want to hear it again? Of that the present writer is doubtful.

Likewise new to New York was the transcription for full orchestra by the Roman, Bernardino Molinari, of Debussy's familiar piano piece, "L'Isle Joyeuse." Messer Bernardino has made a dark continent indeed out of Debussy's magic island girt round with jocund foam. There is comfort in the knowledge that the composer did not live to hear it.

This concert began dutifully with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. There followed the Vaughan Williams fantasia for double string orchestra on a theme by old Thomas Tallis. Finally, after the two "first times," came the glorious "Istar" variations of Vincent d'Indy, which these last few years have been neglected inexplicably. The big audience, by the way, obviously liked joy riding with Honegger in "Pacific 231."

There was singing worth the hearing in our town yesterday. That well known contralto, Florence Mulford, began it at Aeolian Hall in the afternoon. At the same hall in the evening, Mischa Leon, a tenor and a fine artist, contributed more of it. And at the Town Hall last evening, the Fisk University Jubilee Singers, rich of voice and five in number, gave a concert which deserved an evening all to itself.

PITTS SANBORN.

WAGNER MUSIC GLORIFIED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By E. F. HARKINS

Full of poetry was yesterday's Symphony concert, with Serge Koussevitky conjuring ineffable charm, both lyric and dramatic, out of the music of Weber and Wagner.

Serge Koussevitzky

Over the new French work on this fourth program, Albert Roussel's symphony in B flat, the new conductor's almost magic wand swept with no end of fervor; but the net result was a technical triumph for Koussevitzky and Roussel. The music is for the most part sour and cerebral. It was heard yesterday for the first time in the United States. Maybe it will be liked better by and by. It suggests Puritan passions.

WAGNER GLORIFIED

But Puritan music lovers found much more to admire in the familiar numbers on the program, Weber's "Oberon" overture and three selections from Wagner's operas, the "Tannhaeuser" bacchanale, the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and the "Mastersingers" prelude.

In these four pieces the profound artistic feeling that distinguishes Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting was in full play. There was an airy, fairy loveliness about the "Oberon" music, as there should be, combined with flashes of dazzling melodic brilliance. The performance caught the spirit of the composition. That is the secret of these continuous Koussevitzky triumphs. There is nothing superficial about them. This was so yesterday even in the Roussel symphony, but in that instance there was little poetry to conjure up. It was mostly caviare writing.

OLYMPIAN EFFECTS

Only when led here years ago by Muck and Toscanini has Wagner's music sounded so Olympian as it does this week under the sympathetic mediumship of Mr. Koussevitzky. The bacchanale needed no Ballet Russe to outline this Venusberg scene. The music for once left little to the imagination. No Puritan passion about this! The Siegfried funeral music once again, as seldom before, seemed fit for Caesars and Titans. The "Mastersingers" overture was revealed in all its polyphonic wizardry. All of which left the audience enraptured.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 2 1924

Boston Orchestra to Open Symphony Season

A great musical treat is expected in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its celebrated new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be introduced to the Pittsburgh public for the first time. The Boston Orchestra concerts will open the symphony season on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque. Two different programs will be given and they are:

FRIDAY NIGHT.

Concerto for orchestra in D major.....
.....Bach, C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
Overture to Egmont, Op. 84.....Beethoven
Pictures at an Exhibition.....Moussorgsky
(Arranged by M. Ravel)
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98..Brahms

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in G minor (Kochel No. 550)
.....Mozart
Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky
.....Arensky
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op 9
.....Berlioz
Prelude to the opera, "Khovantchina"
.....Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee,"
Scherzo from the opera "Tsar Saltan".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Poem of Ecstasy, Op 54.....Scriabin

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
NOV 2 1924

Great Russian Conductor to Visit Portland This Season

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

It is learned that, through the efforts of the Music Commission, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its brilliant new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian, will visit Portland again this season. There will be a midwinter concert and, besides the enjoyment always felt in the visits of these noted performers, there will be great curiosity in seeing the conductorship feat of Koussevitzky, who is said to have infused great life into the work of the orchestra and given it the "pep" which, despite its skilled attainments, in the opinion of many, it has always lacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 2 19

This week, besides the San Carlo opera season, there is an unusual number of minor recitals, for which the programs are given elsewhere in this department. Ruth Breton, violinist, to be heard Thursday, is a pupil of Auer, whose home is in Louisville, Ky. She has lately been praised by leading New York reviewers after making her debut there, and is now presumably making a round of other large cities before undertaking concert tours. Betty Gray, of Cambridge, a contralto who has been heard in Philadelphia with Sousa's Band and hereabouts in churches and before Masonic gatherings, will make a debut Thursday night. Katherine Metcalf gave a recital Dec 4, 1923, at Jordan Hall which was favorably received.

great classics this week. Mozart's G
Koussevitzky is turning again to the minor symphony will be in some ways the severest test his interpretive powers have yet undergone before Boston audinces. The novelty, an orchestral arrangement by Ravel of piano pieces suggested to Musorgsky by an exhibition of paintings, should prove interesting. It is certainly not ultra modern, since Musorgsky has been dead longer than Brahms or Wagner or Verdi.

Koussevitzky is not going to be bound by precedents as conductor of the Boston Symphony. That is probably the moral of his putting two trivial, if effective, fragments from Russian operas on the programs week before last. It is certainly the moral of his repeating one of these trifles, which beautifully demonstrated the virtuosity of orchestra and conductor at the Saturday evening concert a week ago last night in response to applause which cannot be described as an overwhelming tribute. No operatic scraps, no "stunts," no "gumdrops" have been offered Boston Symphony audiences for many years. The only other encore in the history of the orchestra, so far as either memory or inquiry shows, was granted quite justifiably by Monteux at the altogether unique Saturday night concert when the orchestra was disrupted by the strike.

What Maj Higginson would have said to Koussevitzky about the encore can readily be imagined. The founder of wonders whether Koussivitzky has the Boston Symphony did not believe in playing to the gallery. But one ever heard of Maj Higginson.

All of which does not alter the obvious truth that Koussevitzky is a fine musician and a really great conductor. The more the pity that he should so underestimate his public here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 2 1924

Boston Symphony

Sale of Seats

Seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here go on sale to-morrow at Steinert's. Although the interest this season is centred almost wholly in the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the soloists to appear here are of prime importance. Perhaps the most notable is Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who, after triumps abroad, established himself in his own country last season as one of the most admired of concert singers. He sang with the Boston orchestra last season and appears with them this year and also with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, is a newcomer to Providence. He made his debut in this country last year in two recitals in Carnegie Hall, New York. In Europe he is widely known and esteemed. In 1921 in Paris, he played with Koussevitzsky's orchestra. That same year, Paul Kochanski, Polish violinist, arrived in this country. He has appeared with the Boston Symphony in Boston.

Another singer for the concerts here is Marguerite d'Alvarez, a contralto who comes from Peru. She has sung with Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera Company and the Boston Opera Company, and in the principal opera houses of Europe. Lately, though, she has appeared exclusively on the concert stage where the range and color of her voice and intelligence of interpretation have been highly praised.

* * *

NOV 2 1924

What Maj Higginson would have said to Koussevitzky about the encore can readily be imagined. The founder of wonders whether Koussivitzky has the Boston Symphony did not believe in playing to the gallery. But one ever heard of Maj Higginson.

All of which does not alter the obvious truth that Koussevitzky is a fine musician and a really great conductor. The more the pity that he should so underestimate his public here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
NOV 2 1924

It become evident that Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra coming to Elmwood Music hall Thursday evening, November 13, under local management of Bessie Bellanca, is a smasher of traditions. It has been a cherished precedent of the Boston Symphony for forty-three years, virtually a law, that encores are prohibited. But in the third concert of the series in Symphony hall, Boston, on October 17, the iconoclastic Russian threw precedent to the winds and answered applause with an encore. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," according to the Boston Post, was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelievable virtuosity of the orchestra. "The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Kousseviezky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his orchestra."

On the same evening, the orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership gave Beethoven's fifth symphony, which also will be given at the coming visit here of the orchestra. There was considerable curious anticipation of this event as word had come from Europe, where Koussevitzky has been conductor of the Moscow orchestra and a virtuoso whose daring has become a legend in musical Europe, that this conductor interpreted classical symphonies very much in his own way, causing angry protest from certain conservatives and worshippers of tradition. His Boston audience, however, found no cause for complaint. Koussevitzky convinced his hearers that they need have no fears of freakish distortion of the classics or unwarrantable extravagance of accent. The critics of the Boston press were united in their praise of Koussevitzky's eloquence and extraordinary rhythmic vitality. In the Boston Transcript, H. T. Parker wrote: "Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky laid the hand of power, as one who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. To the utmost Mr. Koussevitzky's sense of rhythm beat through the symphony deepening the glow, intensifying the sweep, re-kindling the passion. Rhythm tossed through the first movement, was wing to the second; conjured up the creep and leap of the transition, marshaled the reiterant elation of the finale. There will be debate of Mr. Koussevitzky's pace. Irresistible was his rhythm."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

Nov 2

The fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall will be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. These concerts will be followed by the first week's trip of the orchestra to other cities. Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following program: Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition (arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel). This score which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced in Europe with much success, will have its first American performance. Moussorgsky's music characterizes one after another a series of paintings with a promenade in between as the beholder strolls from each to each.

Koussevitzky is turning again to the minor symphony will be in some ways the severest test his interpretive powers have yet undergone before Boston audinces. The novelty, an orchestral arrangement by Ravel of piano pieces suggested to Musorgsky by an exhibition of paintings, should prove interesting. It is certainly not ultra modern, since Musorgsky has been dead longer than Brahms or Wagner or Verdi.

Koussevitzky is not going to be bound by precedents as conductor of the Boston Symphony. That is probably the moral of his putting two trivial, if effective, fragments from Russian operas on the programs week before last. It is certainly the moral of his repeating one of these trifles, which beautifully demonstrated the virtuosity of orchestra and conductor at the Saturday evening concert a week ago last night in response to applause which cannot be described as an overwhelming tribute. No operatic scraps, no "stunts," no "gumdrops" have been offered Boston Symphony audiences for many years. The only other encore in the history of the orchestra, so far as either memory or inquiry shows, was granted quite justifiably by Monteux at the altogether unique Saturday night concert when the orchestra was disrupted by the strike.

Tuesday at 4 and Wednesday at 4 Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Program for young people. Adults unaccompanied by children cannot be admitted.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, fifth program. Overture to "Egmont," Beethoven; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Variations on a theme by Tchaikovsky, Arensky; "Pictures from an Exhibition," Musorgsky-Ravel (First time in

Mr. Koussevitzky's Innovations

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy of Music on Nov. 28, is doing things never done before at this orchestra's Boston concerts. He is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America, and if his interpretations of the classical symphonies, such as Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' Fourth, are not strictly according to the letter of tradition, his readings are so eloquent and persuasive that they have been met with general enthusiasm and no dissenting voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky broke a tradition of forty-four years at the concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 25 when he repeated Rimsky-Korsakov's little Scherzo of the Bumblebee, from "Tsar Saltan." Such a thing as an encore has never been given at Boston Symphony concerts, but the extreme brevity and complete charm of the little piece excused the infraction of the rule.

Scores introduced to Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky included Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," Albert Roussel's Symphony, op. 23 (which had its first American performance last Friday and Saturday), and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

178

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
NOV 2 1924

Music and Musicians

By MARY M. HOWARD.

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra coming to Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 13th, under local management of Bessie Bellanca, is a smasher of traditions. It has been a cherished precedent of the Boston Symphony for 43 years, virtually a law, that encores are prohibited. But in the third concert of the series in Symphony hall, Boston, on October 17th, the concoclastic Russian threw precedent to the winds and answered applause with an encore. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo The Flight of the Bumble Bee according to the Boston Post, was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the virtuosity of the orchestra. "The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Kousevitzky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his orchestra. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the handclapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the Bumble Bee was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra." The Bumble Bee is one of the numbers included in the programme which Koussevitzky will present in Buffalo.

On the same evening, the orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership gave Beethoven's fifth symphony, which also will be given at the coming visit here of the orchestra. There was considerable curious anticipation as word had come from Europe where Koussevitzky has been conductor of the Moscow orchestra and a virtuoso whose daring has become a legend in musical Europe, that this conductor interpreted classical symphonies very much in his own way, causing angry protests from certain conservatives and worshippers of tradition. His Boston audience, however, found no cause for comiplaint. Koussevitzky convinced his hearers that they need have no fears of freakish distortion of the classics or unwarrantable extravagances. The critics of the Boston press were united in their praise of Koussevitzky, H. T. Parker wrote:

Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Kousse-vitzky laid the hand of power as one who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. At will, as in the transition from scherzo to finale, he held it almost in suspensive rustle. For it he phrased, as by a human voice, the songful measures of the andante. At every turn the conductor was master of line, progress and accent. He began in turbulence, he seemed to fling in contrasts, but his sea of sound broadened, deepened, mounted, while it never was opaque. The song of the andante was measured. To the utmost Mr. Koussevitzky's sense of rhythm beat through the symphony, deepening the glow, intensifying the sweep, rekindling the passion. Rhythm tossed through the first movement, was wing to the second, conjured up the creep and leap of the transition, marshaled the reiterant elation of the finale. There will be debate of Mr. Koussevitzky's pace. Irresistible was his rhythm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
NOV 2 1924

World of Music

HONEGGER'S "Pacific 231":

Quite the most talked about novelty of the year's new music is Arthur Honegger's symphonic movement bearing the name "Pacific 231," a title that arouses curiosity and which, when its meaning is explained, quickly stirs the imagination.

First played in Paris last spring, and in Boston two weeks ago, "Pacific 231" will undoubtedly figure on one of Serge Koussevitzky's or Walter Damrosch's Brooklyn programmes in the near future. Mr. Damrosch gave the composition its first New York performance at the Symphony Society's Carnegie Hall concert on Friday night and is repeating it this afternoon at Aeolian Hall.

Arthur Honegger was born in Le Havre, France, of Swiss parents. He is known as a member of that interesting musical coterie called the "Groupe des Six," who do not undertake to disregard all established rules and conventions of musical composition, but each follows his own inclination in accepting or rejecting them.

Honegger studied first in his native city, later in Zurich and finally in Paris, where he was a pupil of Capet in violin, of d'Indy in conducting, and of Gedalge and Widor in composition at the Conservatoire. Heredity rather than environment appears to have exercised a stronger influence upon his artistic development, for he is reported to be a closer follower of Bach, Beethoven and Wagner than of the French school, while, among the moderns, he has been chiefly influenced by Strauss, Reger, Schonberg and Florent Schmitt.

The symphonic movement "Pacific 231" was first performed at the Koussevitzky concert in Paris on May 8, 1924, at which time the composer offered the following explanatory comment on his work:

"I have always passionately loved locomotives. To me, they are living creatures, and I love them as others love women and horses. What I wanted to express in the 'Pacific' is not the noise of an engine, but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it."

Andre George in the "Revue Musicale" (Paris, June 1, 1924), wrote:

This passionate love Honegger translates in the most magnificent language. He chooses as his heroine the locomotive of the Pacific type, No. 231, for heavy trains of high speed. At first, there is a hissing of harmonies in the violins while the monster is still at rest; then the effort of getting under way necessitates heavy passages in the double bases; acceleration brings into play the entire orchestral mass, to culminate in the lyric state, the pathos of the 300-ton train hurtling through the night at a speed of seventy miles an hour. This lyric joy is clamored by horns and trombones over the prodigious violence of the strings * * * after which dynamic force is subdued by powerful brakes, and the train arrives in broad and sumptuous chords."

The work is scored for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, gong and strings.

The first American performance was given under Koussevitzky at Boston, Oct. 10, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Metropolitan Opera Opens Brooklyn Season on Election Night

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 2 1924

Koussevitsky's Program.

It becomes evident that Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming to Elmwood Music Hall, Thursday evening, November 13th, under local management of Bessie Bellanca, is a smasher of traditions. It has been a cherished precedent of the Boston Symphony for 45 years, virtually a law, that encores are prohibited. But in the third concert of the series in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 17th the iconoclastic Russian threw precedent to the winds and answered applause with an encore. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," according to the Boston Post, was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelieveable virtuosity of the orchestra. "The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitsky bade the players rise in acknowledgement. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his orchestra. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the hand-clapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee" was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra." The Bumble Bee" is one of the numbers included in the program which Koussevitsky will present in Buffalo.

On the same evening, the orchestra, under Koussevitsky's leadership, gave Beethoven's 5th Symphony, which also will be given at the coming visit here of the orchestra. There was considerable curious anticipation of this event as word had come from Europe, where Koussevitsky has been conductor of the Moscow Orchestra, and a virtuoso whose daring has become a legend in musical Europe, that this conductor interpreted classical symphonies very much in his own way, causing angry protest from certain conservatories and worshippers of tradition. His Boston audience, however, found no excuse for complaint. Koussevitsky convinced his hearers that they need have no fears of freakish distortion of the classics or unwarranted extravagances of accent. The critics of the Boston press were united in their praise of Koussevitsky's eloquence and extraordinary rhythmic vitality. In the Boston Evening Transcript, H. T. Parker wrote: "Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Koussevitsky laid the hand of power, as one who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. At will, as in the transition from Scherzo to Finale, he held it almost in suspensive rustle. For it, he phrased, as by a human voice, the songful measures of the Andante. At every turn, the conductor was master of line, progress and accent. He began in turbulence, he seemed to fling in contrasts, but his sea of sound broadened, deepened, mounted; while it never was opaque. The song of the Andante was measured. To the utmost Mr. Koussevitsky's sense of rhythm beat through the symphony, deeping the glow, intensifying the sweep, rekindling the passion. Rhythm tossed through the first movement; was wing to the second; conjured up the creep and the leap of the transition, marshalled the reiterant elation of the Finale. There will be debate of Mr. Koussevitsky's pace. Irresistable was his rhythm."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 250 Delaware Avenue.

"Strange" Doings at Our Symphony Concerts. What Do Young Folks Really Like?

The repetition of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bee" at a Symphony concert has excited comment. A "rule" was then broken; or shall we say that a tradition was disregarded? A rule against the wearing of hats has been printed for a good many years on the title page of the programs, but there has been no express declaration against repetitions. The program books of the Chicago Symphony orchestra give these "extracts from house rules":

"Hats must not be worn during the performance. Encores not permitted."

Since the repetition of Rimsky's charming and amusing little Scherzo, it has been stated in newspapers that Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette" was repeated at a Symphony concert during Mr. Henschel's reign. Was this piece, said to have been written by Gounod in mockery of the peculiar gait of the critic H. F. Chorley, repeated? It was performed on Oct. 28, 1882. The reviews published in the newspapers discussed the question whether the piece was not of a too light, not to say frivolous, nature for the supposedly solemn occasion. They said that the applause was enthusiastic; they did not say that the performance was repeated. The late Louis C. Elson, reviewing the concert, said that the audience "actually tried to force an encore." "Tried." This would imply that there was no repetition.

A correspondent writes: "My memory is that the Scherzo, which is all pizzicato for the strings from some symphony, was repeated in response to applause. I think it was under Paur."

Does our correspondent refer to the Scherzo in Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony which was played when Mr. Paur ruled the roost?

There is this to be said about repetitions of a song or of an instrumental piece: The second performance is seldom as satisfactory as the first, and when the music is of an unusual character the element of surprise is lacking. "Encore." Was the word as noun ever shouted by enraptured hearers in France or Italy? We doubt it. The word commonly used in those countries is "bis." In Italy "da capo" was formerly heard.

When the "Funeral March of a Marionette" was played at a Symphony concert, some protested against the choice as being unworthy, not in keeping with the dignity that should characterize the programs; but the audience was as delighted as Miss Clara in the old story. No doubt there are "purists" who think the "Flight of the Bumble Bee" too light. But, men and brethren, there is amusement, there is joy, as well as psychological problems and doleful dumps in music. Let us again quote the saying in the "Deipnosophists" of Athenaeus, which might well be written in letters of gold on a wall of every concert hall: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy." "Gentlemanlike." This means that pleased hearers should not stamp the floor with feet, canes or umbrellas, or shout "Hi! Hi!" or any other loud cry.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked for acquainting us with this fanciful page of Rimsky.

The program he has arranged for the young people's concerts this week is of a different nature from those of the past. They were apparently planned to let the boys and girls hear what they ought to hear. As a result, the children were often bored. They applauded pieces in which the rhythm was strongly marked, as the March to the Scaffold from the "Fantastic" symphony. They were cool and collected during pieces that were supposed to "educate" them. The program of the concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons comprise excerpts from Mendelssohn's incidental music for "Midsummer Night's Dream," Stravinsky's Song of the Volga Bargemen; the Canzonetta from Tchaikovsky's violin concerto (Mr. Burgin); Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee"; two movements from d'Indy's Suite in D (Mr. Mager, trumpeter), and the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz.

Stravinsky's version of the Volga son "Eh Ughnyem" is for wind instruments and percussion. It was published in 1920 and played by the Philadelphia orchestra last month. It is said that Stravinsky has treated the famous song "literally and simply, preserving with fine tact, its strong simplicity, its pathos, and its mournful and sombre beauty." (Lawrence

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 2 1924

Naturally the principal interest in the coming season of five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 10, Feb. 24, and April 21, centres in the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Nevertheless, the soloists are of the highest order, and their talents should add greatly to the importance of the coming series.

The name of Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto, is associated with the best days of Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera Company, and the Boston Opera Company, likewise with the principal opera houses of Europe. The magnificent range and color of her voice, and her fine intelligence have made equally notable her recent appearances in concert.

Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, has long been esteemed in Europe but until last season he has been known only by name in America. His two recitals in Carnegie Hall, New York, were probably as much discussed as those of any new-coming pianist. Borovsky appeared in Paris under Serge Koussevitzky's baton in 1921.

Boston Symphony

Sale of Seats

Seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here go on sale to-morrow at Steinert's. Although the interest this season is centred almost wholly in the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the soloists to appear here are of prime importance. Perhaps the most notable is Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who, after triumps abroad, established himself in his own country last season as one of the most admired of concert singers. He sang with the Boston orchestra last season and appears with them this year and also with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, is a newcomer to Providence. He made his debut in this country last year in two recitals in Carnegie Hall, New York. In Europe he is widely known and esteemed. In 1921 in Paris, he played with Koussevitzsky's orchestra. That same year, Paul Kochanski, Polish violinist, arrived in this country. He has appeared with the Boston Symphony in Boston.

Another singer for the concerts here is Marguerite d'Alvarez, a contralto who comes from Peru. She has sung with Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera Company and the Boston Opera Company, and in the principal opera houses of Europe. Lately, though, she has appeared exclusively on the concert stage where the range and color of her voice and intelligence of interpretation have been highly praised.

Public Library's

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 2 1924

Koussevitzky Surprises His American Audiences

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy, on Nov. 28, is doing things never done before at this orchestra's Boston concerts. He is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky broke a tradition of forty-four years at the concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 25 when he repeated Rimsky-Korsakov's little Scherzo of the Bumble Bee, from "Tsar Saltan." Such a thing as an encore had never been given at Boston Symphony concerts, but the extreme brevity and complete charm of the little piece excused the infraction of the rule.

179

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
NOV 2 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is making a tremendous impression. He will conduct the orchestra at a concert in Portland later in the season.

The following account of a recent concert shows the calibre of the new conductor:—

Less than a month's acquaintance with Serge Koussevitzky shows his independence, daring and contempt for tradition and custom. He breaks precedent with suave assurance that wins his younger patrons' admiration. In the music he puts pauses where none is written, whips up the tempo in passages other conductors play at metronomic pace, makes phrases stand out that heretofore were but humble parts of the structure, in fact does about everything differently than his predecessors at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the third concert, Saturday night, he smashed one of the most cherished precedents, a law almost in the spirit in which it has been rigidly observed for 43 years, that prohibiting encores, or repetition. The applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," was spontaneous and unanimous, a deserved tribute to the almost unbelievable virtuosity of the orchestra. The piece was of most intense brilliance and played with the nth degree of elegance and lightness, but all too short.

The applause kept up and grew in intensity when Mr. Koussevitzky bade the players rise inacknowledgment. He is the last word in courtesy and generosity, refusing to accept the tribute of applause for himself, but always passing it along to his band. After a minute or two, during which the applause continued, he stepped to the desk and stilled the handclapping by raising his arms slowly, then lowering them to the desk top, and the "Bumble Bee" was again in flight. He had repeated it! Given an encore! Something never before done at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Here is a little more about the conducting of Koussevitsky, the present brilliant young leader of the Boston Symphony:—

Berlioz' Overture, The Roman Carnival, found Mr. Koussevitsky on his mettle. His reading of the work was characterized by a keen sense of the dramatic. Accents were biting, color contrasts were startling, rhythms were whipped, and climaxes were piled up with sweeping effect. The final chord, starting from a pianissimo and drawn up to furious fortissimo, was the signal for round after round of applause. Mr. Koussevitsky conquered. Appropriately, he insisted that the superb orchestra, Mr. Monteux's legacy to him, share in his triumph.

Mrs. Warren D...

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 2 1924

SYMPHONY CONCERTS
For Young People

The first of this year's series of concerts for young people will take place at Symphony Hall on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons. Mr. Koussevitzky has set an enticing programme: Overture, Scherzo and March from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Stravinsky's version of the "Volga Boatmen's Song," hitherto unheard here; Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo of the Bumblebee that so delighted last week's "grown-up" audience that it brought an almost unprecedented encore; the Minuet and the Rondo from d'Indy's Suite in the Olden Style; and the Blue Danube Waltz; while Mr. Burgin as soloist will play the Canzonetta from Tchaikovsky's Concerto for the violin. Wallace Goodrich will make the introductory and explanatory remarks. As in other years, adults will be admitted only under the escort of children.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 2 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY COMING.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy, on November 28, is doing things never done before at this orchestra's Boston concerts. He is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America, and if his interpretations of the classical symphonies such as Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' Fourth are not strictly according to the letter of tradition, his readings are so eloquent and persuasive that they have been met with general enthusiasm and no dissenting voice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 2 1924

New Scores Played By Koussevitzky.

Scores introduced to Boston by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included: Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," which was performed in Symphony Hall Oct. 24 and 25; Albert Roussel's Symphony, Op. 23, which had its first American performance last Friday and Saturday; and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel, which are to have their first American performance at the Boston concerts of the present week.

Mr. Koussevitzky's New York debut will take place in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
NOV 3 1924

Up River Volga With Abell and Famous Russ Orchestra

By JESSIE MacBRIDE.

There is a man resident in Washington who, with his wife, had the great privilege of taking part in what was perhaps one of the most unique concert tours in the world, spending ten weeks along the River Volga in Russia with Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his personal orchestra of 100 players.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Abell were the only Americans ever invited by Koussevitzky to make one of these tours as his guests, and they call it the most dramatic musical event of their lives—which have been full of great musical events.

For Arthur M. Abel was for twenty-five years the Berlin representative of the Musical Courier, living in Europe for twenty years and coming to Washington four years ago, as the National Capital is the home of his wife, Adeline Partello Abell, daughter of the famous possessor of the Partello violin collection which was sold here recently and which is ranked as probably the greatest private collection in the world with its four famous "Strads," a Cremona and other treasures.

"I have know Koussevitzky for more than twenty years," Mr. Abell says. "He is an idealist with very lofty aims and he visited these remote towns on the Volga in the role of a great musical missionary, preaching the gospel of the beautiful to the inhabitants of all the larger towns on the banks of that majestic river.

Art and Philanthropy.

"A special steamer had been chartered by Kosevitzky for the trip which covered 2,500 miles, or the entire navigable portion of the Volga. This was in 1914. There were no concert halls anywhere along the route, the theaters being the only available auditoriums. But I was astonished at the size and elegance of some of these theaters, which seated from 2,000 to 3,000 people and were well appointed in every respect.

"Koussevitzky did not cater to the primitive musical understanding of his Volga audiences. He gave them Beethoven's Eroica and Seventh symphonies, his E flat and G major piano concertos with Eduard Risler, of Paris, as solist; Liszt's symphonic poem, Mezeppa; Rachmaninoff's second symphony, Rimsky-Korsakow's Easter Festival Overture; Weber's Invitation to the Dance; Skryabin's second symphony; Chaikowsky's fifth and numerous smaller works."

The program not only reveals Koussevitzky and his gift of fitting an effective program to meet an occasion, but it brings these Eastern peoples nearer us through that intangible "universal language"—music. Mr. Abell speaks about their love for the "lofty" and the "beautiful," and both their enthusiasm and their rapt attention.

"It was like watching the face of an unspoiled child while listening to a beautiful fairy tale," he writes in an interesting article in the Bostin Transcript. Never had a symphony orchestra visited them before. "At Saratow a deputation of the citizens called on Koussevitzky and requested that he place the harps at the front of the stage at the concert in order that the people could see and admire those beautiful golden instruments.

"Koussevitzky spent fully $100,000 a year out of his own pocket in maintaining his orchestra of 100 men. He is the only professional musician of our times wealthy enough to maintain a private orchestra of this character. He founded the orchestra in 1909 in Moscow, recruiting it from the best performers obtainable. He paid them high salaries which assured them a good living, and they were pledged to give their services to him only.

ORIGINAL AND VITAL.

"Thus he was enabled to rehearse to his heart's content and to fully impress his own will upon his musicians—an ideal often longed for but seldom attained by other conductors.

"Koussevitzky has a wonderful feeling for dynamics, for light and shade, for strong contrasts. He possesses a volcanic temperament, but it is always kept within bounds. His conducting is very original, always interesting and extremely fascinating. But with all his originality he is never freakish or bizarre.

"His ideas of tempi in reading the classics are often at variance with the traditional ideas. Arthur Nikisch was his ideal.

"Koussevitzky's first experience as a symphonic conductor was with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, where he resided from 1903 to 1909. As a preliminary to the Berlin concerts he had practiced for a year with his own private orchestra. And there it was that he profited greatly from Nikisch's example.

"But Koussevitzky has blazed a trail of his own. His strong magnetic personality immediately establishes a contact with the orchestra and with his audience. He is about fifty years of age, tall, dark, alive, possessing elegance and style. He is a 'good dresser,'" Mr. Abell added.

"And no other professional musician of our times has done so much to foster promising young musical talents as Koussevitzky. During the six years he lived in Berlin I was intimately associated with him and to my personal knowledge he was then supporting and financing a large number of young composers and music students, mostly his own country people."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST
NOV 2 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will be in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque. Two different programs will be given.

FRIDAY NIGHT.
Concerto for Orchestra in D. Major.....Bach, C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
Overture to Egmont, Op. 84.....Beethoven
Pictures at an Exhibition.....Moussorgsky
(Arranged by M. Ravel.)
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98..Brahms
SATURDAY AFTERNOON.
Symphony in G Minor (Kochel No. 550)
.....Mozart
Variations on a Theme by Tschaikowsky
.....Arensky
Overture "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
.....Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble-Bee"
(Scherzo from the Opera "Tsar Saltan").....Rimsky-Korsakov
The Poem of Ecstasy, Op. 54.....Scriabin

Transcript Nov 3

TEN

Cur

THE WEEK-END BOOK: ORCHESTRA; SINGER; PIANIST; BEETHOVEN

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, MANNERS AND CUSTOMS

A Change or Two for the Better at Symphony Hall — The People's Orchestra Resumes Its Concerts — Mr. Lamond, Serious Musician in Serious Program—Paul Robeson, Actor and Singer—Absent Shalyapin

LITTLE by little, Mr. Koussevitzky is persuading the audiences at the Symphony Concerts to the manners and customs that he reasonably desires. On both Friday and Saturday, no applause disturbed the brief pauses between the divisions of Monsieur Roussel's Symphony. Some will say that no one could possibly wish to clap "such music"; but a week before the listeners were of quite another mind toward the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. Even so, only once had the conductor to fling up that left arm, half-imperious, half-imploring for silence. Seemingly, the lesson that Mr. Monteux mildly began, is now nearly learned under the more insistent tuition of Mr. Koussevitzky. At best, interrupting and disconcerting applause between the divisions of a piece of music is mere outlet to excited nerves, more appropriate to a movie-house than to a concert-hall. At worst, it is the survival of the primitive notion that every public performance is a "show," to be treated accordingly, even as audiences ask actors to put aside their parts and speechify in their own persons. In New York the habit is dying; in Philadelphia it is dead; in London, in Amsterdam, in most German-speaking cities, it has long been obsolete. Before Mr. Koussevitzky has done, it will also have departed Symphony Hall. He has reason on his side Upon another point of etiquette the conductor and a few in his audiences on Friday afternoons are still at odds. It is his custom to enjoin a pause of silence upon both hearers and players before he beats the first measures of a piece. He would have the music sound upon stillness, cleaving the hushed air. So doing, he forgets the irrepressible cough of the uneasy or the catarrhal. So doing, he also forgets those who discover belatedly a desire to quit the concert and move—stately, slow and all uncomprehending—toward the chosen door. There were those that coughed and those in process of departure when Mr. Koussevitzky would begin the mourning for Siegfried last Friday afternoon. He began it—and stopped the orchestra after the first drum-beats. He said nothing; he looked nothing; he merely waited for stillness. Plainly he likes not the cough in his temple; nor regards an hour and three-quarters of symphonic music as undue exaction between luncheon and tea.

H. T. P.

Under W...

180

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 3 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES TO LOWELL

Under Its New Conductor, Celebrated Orchestra Gives Program in Auditorium.

For its first concert outside of Boston and Cambridge under the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to the Memorial Auditorium yesterday afternoon in a program that testified eloquently to the superb quality of the orchestra and the unquestioned artistry of its leader.

Opening with an old-fashioned concerto of Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, continuing with the Roman Carnival overture of Berlioz, traversing a group of shorter Russian pieces, including an orchestral arrangement of a Vocalise by Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakov's setting of "Dubinouchka," Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," it ended in familiar musical material with the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Interest naturally centred in the new conductor who has succeeded the excellent M. Monteux, coming originally from Russia, with the acclaim of stimulated and approving audiences in Paris and London and elsewhere in Europe to herald him. Happily, good reports of his ability in classic and modern music, of his skill in moulding the various elements of a great orchestra to his musical feeling and will were amply sustained by the performance here.

Tall and straight, calm, as it first seemed almost to the point of restraint, he appeared to suggest his way with the music in hand rather than to compel it. Sparing of gesture, with no trace of the spectacular in his manner, when the moment came for it there was the decisive beat that spoke of authority. In quiet passages he seemed to beckon for a beautiful tone quality. With curving, inward sweep of the arms he drew from the strings and the wood-wind sustained tones which, pulsating at the start, diminished to an exquisite pianissimo. At times, with more vigorous beat and significant gesture he brought the full sonorities of the orchestra into play, quickened pace, stirred rhythm, sought incisive accent. Always, as it seemed, there was the feeling of the melody of the music.

Through almost all the program he stimulated the orchestra and as clearly held the attention of the audience. By every test of the program here the Symphony orchestra should progress to new achievements under his leadership.

Strings, wood-wind and horn simulated in the Bach concerto the more ancient instruments for which the composer wrote. Seemingly the arrangements had been skilfully made, preserving and not distorting the old-fashioned quality of the music. Mr. Koussevitzky's way with it justified the experiment and, in the beauties of the andante alone, it was easy to understand why its simple measures had appealed to him.

For color and changing mood the overture of Berlioz gave pleasant contrast. The dance rhythms were capitally managed, the melody of the English horn songful, the climax singularly effective.

In the Vocalise arranged by Rachmaninoff the strings again were at their best, reinforced by the reeds and horns as the somewhat plaintive melody was developed.

The Song of the Volga Boatmen, familiar in the version on the records of Chaliapin, seemed somewhat obscured in the free arrangement by Rimsky-Korsakov. One got suggestions of it here and there. In itself, however, the version was effective and there was no mistaking the flavor of the Russian folk song.

To those who had heard "Boris Godounov" there were reminiscences of that opera in the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," suggestive of the first act in Boris. Depicting in tone the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, it was marked by effective gradation of tones suggesting the first tints of dawn, the rising color and glow, the final splendor of the risen sun. Clearly Mr. Koussevitzky had visualized the picture and caught the atmosphere so that he made it felt, and that, although the composer had not strained for realism in the manner, for example, of Mascagni.

To set strings, flutes, reeds, horns, trumpets and trombones of the orchestra to simulating a bumble bee would seem as extravagant as using a battery of painters to color a pastel or a miniature. Yet Rimsky-Korsakov managed to do it successfully, and Mr. Koussevitzky, as delicately, led the players through the tricky little number, the musical bee humming and buzzing and flitting about, a rare test of delicate virtuosity for strings and flute, playful throughout and not the least bit lumbering. The first flute of the orchestra, Mr. Laurent, was deservedly bidden to share in the applause, and here, as it was in Boston, the piece was repeated to the delight of the audience. Nor need the conductor need fear criticism for having broken a Brahmin custom [illegible] the Russians came Beethoven [illegible] close, with the familiar Fifth [illegible]ony as the music. So far as [illegible]bserved in Mr. Koussevitzky's [illegible]g of it, there is no reason to [illegible] that he will take undue liberties [illegible] the classics. There was no marked departure from the well established traditions with the music. Here and there, to be sure, it seemed more expressive than ordinary, notably in the songful measures of the andante. To those accustomed to modern dissonances Beethoven's suggestion of the tragic and sinister seems a litlte tame. Even the roll of the tympani is perhaps less startling than of old. But the music, played as it was yesterday, continues to make its impression. Under Mr. Koussevitzky, certainly, it wears well and may still be counted as among the master works, as doubtless it will for years to come.

[illegible]nductor and orchestra at opportune moments were warmly applauded. [illegible]hatever criticism the Soviet [illegible]ment may have to offer as to [illegible] course, Mr. Koussevitzky [illegible]son to complain of lack of [illegible] here.

[illegible]rt was the first in the [illegible] managed by Mr. John I. [illegible] enterprise and whose [illegible] bringing good music here [illegible] been rewarded by a [illegible] audience.

S. R. F.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
UNION
NOV 3 — 1924

A Wordy Battle

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time, and probably still, notably edited by Mr. Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are various received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controveries he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the postoffice department and had denominated the capital of soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State st. this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the elder form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, prehaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, however much one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles.—Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 3 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The arrangement made by President Richmond and Ben Franklin whereby the lecture of Walter de la Mare at Union College has been arranged for 7 o'clock and the program of the Boston Symphony concert at the armory set for 8:30, thus enabling those who desire, to attend both events, is much appreciated, a large number being interested in the two affairs. At the seat sales now in progress at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company and the Barney Company, there is that activity that leads to the prediction that there will be a sold out house for the concert, and indeed it would be a reflection on local musical taste if there were any other result. The fact that Schenectady is to have opportunity for the first time to see Koussevitzky conduct has added greatly to the interest in the Symphony concert, for the reports that have been received indicate that he is a great musician, a born leader, a conductor who fully appreciates his orchestra, and a man of striking personality. The concert is attracting wide interest and there will be a large percentage of music lovers from out of town in attendance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Time
NOV 17 1924

Chicago

Mr. Honegger's Pacific 231 (TIME, Oct. 27) has arrived in Chicago. This rhapsodic translation into musical terms of the progress of a locomotive dashing through the night recently met with an enthusiastic reception when introduced to U. S. audiences by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chicago, accustomed to the rush and roar of Wolverines and 20th Century Limiteds, is a trifle blasé about locomotives—particularly musical ones. The audience reacted to Mr. Honegger's composition with chuckles rather than cheers. One Hackett, reviewer for The Evening Post, was particularly amused. He commented in a mood of tolerant banter. Among other things, he remarked of Mr. Honegger: ". . . he might as well amuse himself with this toy as any other."

. . . .

[illegible]cher Dunger

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD
NOV 3 1924

(Speaks), Fern Rockwood.

"LENINGRAD" PLACED ON BOSTON PROGRAMS ALARMS PATRIOTS

Boston seems doomed to difficulties with its symphony orchestra. When the war came it had a German conductor, and the patriotic descendants of the Revolutionary fathers had difficulty in getting Dr. Muck to play the "Star-Spangled Banner." Now it has a Russian to lead their orchestra, Serge Koussevitky, and conservative Bostonians are indignantly protesting because the word "Leningrad" has appeared several times in the program notes.

It seems that Russian musicians who were born in St. Petersburg, or in Petrograd, if you are willing to go as far as the Kerensky regime, are referred to in the program as having been born in "Leningrad," or as having been graduated from the "Leningrad Conservatory of Music." They were inclined to blame Koussevitky until it was discovered he was as indignant over the word "Leningrad" as any Back bay Bostonian could possibly be.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine," he said. "I have left my country because of him. I had a fortune of more than a million in your money, and it is gone—all gone—they took it from me."

That should certainly clear Mr. Koussevitky from the Leningrad charge. But the officers and trustees of the Boston orchestra are making an investigation that may reveal nothing more than a Bolshevist typesetter or proofreader who took the liberty of changing St. Petersburg to Leningrad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 3 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The arrangement made by President Richmond and Ben Franklin whereby the lecture of Walter de la Mare at Union College has been arranged for 7 o'clock and the program of the Boston Symphony concert at the armory set for 8:30, thus enabling those who desire, to attend both events, is much appreciated, a large number being interested in the two affairs. At the seat sales now in progress at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company and the Barney Company, there is that activity that leads to the prediction that there will be a sold out house for the concert, and indeed it would be a reflection on local musical taste if there were any other result. The fact that Schenectady is to have opportunity for the first time to see Koussevitzky conduct has added greatly to the interest in the Symphony concert, for the reports that have been received indicate that he is a great musician, a born leader, a conductor who fully appreciates his orchestra, and a man of striking personality. The concert is attracting wide interest and there will be a large percentage of music lovers from out of town in attendance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 4 1924

Boston and Leningrad

(From the New York Telegram)

Indignant Bostonians have protested against the use of the word Leningrad in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra and a native of Russia, is outspoken in his earnest wish that the one-time capital of the Tsars be termed St. Petersburg or Petrograd.

Mr. Koussevitzky declares that it is because of Lenine and Trotzky that he lost a fortune of a million dollars and had to leave his own country. He would tolerate no echo of Lenine in his new domain of the Boston Symphony.

And yet, heartily as one may detest the theories and practice of the junta that rules at Moscow, a fact remains a fact. Boston is as powerless to decide the name of the Russian city on the Neva as were King Canute and Dame Partington to rule the tides of mighty ocean.

Suppose Willem Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, expressed an unalterable belief that the New England colonies stole a march on the New Netherlands, and in consequence informed the Philharmonic board that only if they substituted New Amsterdam for New York in the title of their society would he remain as its conductor? Suppose the Washington government insisted that the Mikado reigns at Yeddo. Suppose that Germans the world over addressed letters to "Metz" and "Strassburg, Deutschland!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
GAZETTE
NOV 4 1924

A Wordy Battle

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Mr. Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are variously received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the postoffice department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, howevermuch one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles.—Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
NOV 4 1924

The degree to which interest in symphonic music in America has grown was shown recently when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was obliged to give two full performances of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" to accommodate all who wished to hear it.

181

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 4 - 1924

...rican.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

That there will be a throng in attendance at the concert of the Boston Symphony at the State Armory, Schenectady, next Monday night, is shown in no uncertain manner by the demand for seats for the occasion. The seat sales are being held at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and at the Wallace Company, and each sale reports activity that is surprising, even though a great demand was expected. Schenectady is one of the many cities that has always been loyal to the Boston Symphony, and our people have always enjoyed immensely the visits of the orchestra, but it is evident that in the coming concert we shall hear a new Boston Symphony so potent is the effect of the conducting of Serge Kouseevitzky, the new leader of the organization. Reports of his ability that have come to us are so praiseworthy that it is difficult to believe them, but they continue after each concert that he conducts, and they certainly are convincing. He dominates the orchestra with his personality, but in every report there is some remark showing that he is the soul of generosity and that he fully appreciates the magnificent band over which he is now the head. His coming to Schenectady has no doubt stimulated the interest in the concert, and it is equally certain that he will receive a warm welcome from our people.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 5 192...

SYMPHONY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Orchestra Gives First Concert of Series—Stravinsky on Program

CHILDREN ENJOY THE PERFORMANCE

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its Young People's Concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo and March from the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Stravinsky, Song of the Volga Bargemen; Tchaikovsky, Canzonetta from violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist); Rimsky-Korsakov, 'The Flight of the Bumble Bee from "Tsar Saltan"; d'Indy, Minuet from Suite in D (In the Olden Style), Mr. Mager, trumpeter; J. Strauss, Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube."

What, Stravinsky for the young and innocent? Well, why not? No one gives boys and girls any longer the improving, highly moral tales of Mrs. Sherwood. We doubt if boys now clamor for "Sandford and Merton" as a Christmas gift. By the time the boys of 1924 have reached man's estate, Stravinsky may be to audiences as Haydn is today, and the girls who will then be betrothed or wedded may ask: "Can't we hear something new?" We remember when conservative concert-goers in Boston thought the symphony by blameless Cesar Franck immoral. As for Richard Strauss, when his "Till" was performed for the first time, he was a madman, a son of Belial, if not Antichrist in the guise of a composer.

This arrangement by Stravinsky of the famous song of the bargemen on the Volga was performed here for the first time. Stravinsky arranged it for wood-wind, brass and percussion instruments. It is a comparatively recent work, having been published in 1920. The text of the song, "Eh, Ughnyem," consists of a few exclamations, with six other words. As given in an English version, it reads: "Pull, boys, pull! Once again, lads, pull the rope that rows the boat, winding round yon curly birch." For the brutal practice of using human labor to haul the loaded barges up and down the Volga was not abandoned until toward the middle of the last century. There are many arrangements of the folk tune. This one by Stravinsky was played in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia orchestra on the 17th of last month.

If any one should reproach the management for allowing Stravinsky music to be played for young people, the authorities could say, with the poor girl in the story: "But it is such a little one," for, sonorously impressive as the arrangement is, it is simple and very short.

The children enjoyed the orchestra and the soloists greatly. The "Bumble Bee" was repeated. Wallace Goodrich, speaking before the selections a few well-chosen words, supplemented the helpful program notes written by Mr. Burk.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 5 192...

HARVEST OF A DAY; CONCERT FOR YOUTH; AGAIN STRAVINSKY

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY PLEASES THE CHILDREN

First Venture Into New Field—A Genial Afternoon—Thick Voice for the Volga Boatmen—Everywhere, "Pacific 231"—The Sweating Schmitt

WHEN children and young people are to hear symphonic music, Mr. Koussevitzky would plainly have the occasion pleasure rather than education; possibly because he knows there is no other way with the arts. Genial, even, would he make the atmosphere of the concert. Yesterday afternoon he beamed upon the youthful audience in Symphony Hall; waited with amused patience for chatter to subside; bowed to applause as though it were the compliment of connoisseurs; seemed as pleased as the children at a repetition of "The Scherzo of the Bee"; gave the orchestra an inch more freedom; but diminished not a whit his habitual zest and pains. Up and down the hall ran th current of mutual pleasure; while, in the opportunity of solo-pieces, Mr. Burgin, the violinist, and Mr. Mager, the trumpeter, also sped it. From the outset of these concerts, no audience has remained to the end so intent and responsive. Besides, there were Mr. Burk's program-leaflets, inimitable in kind, and Mr. Goodrich's preludes of the spoken word to add understanding to pleasure.

Unlike many of their elders, youngsters listen, unafraid and happy, to the demons of modernist music. They have no prepossessions. Not for an instant do they suspect that arch-fiends are tweaking or hammering at their ears. Open, honest and frank by virtue of their young days, they take the music for the pleasure it gives them. Consequently they listened eagerly to Stravinsky's arrangement of the "Song of the Volga Bargemen"; liked and clapped it. The piece is very brief; discards the strings; moves to heavy rhythms in ponderous masses of tone; summons the pervading, but not the only mood, of the folk-song. Stravinsky sees and feels the hulking haulers tugging at the laden boats, under a leaden sky, along a bank still wintry. He hears the dull refrain, the straining, reiterated, carking, rhythm of their song. He fails to remember the birch trees that soon will be waving, leafy, in the summer air. He stands by to record with observing eye and ear, emotionless. The thick contours of his music recall these strong men, bent and knotted with the burden of their toil. Primitive men in the mass he is singing in these blocks of tone. And the rhythm and the motion plod to their stride—monotonous as the sky, endless as the river. Yet Stravinsky does not pity, much less sentimentalize. He is of an objective generation in music.

There was not a moral to another piece within Mr Koussevitzky's program. Upon the children he flashed the brightness humor, fancy of Mendelssohn's timeless and changeless music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Possibly the older teens heard the fairies tripping and Bottom clomping through the Overture Possibly they felt those wondrous chords at the beginning and the end that after a hundred years are still enchantment. (God forbid that at their time of life they should talk about them!) Anyhow, everyone "loved" the rhythmed clang of The March Mr. Burgin's violin sighed sweetly through the Canzonetta of Chaikovsky's Concerto—the bonbon of the afternoon. Yet Mr. Mager's trumpet, bright and clear as it sported and skipped through Monsieur d'Indy's olden dances, seemed more to the taste of these twentieth-century youngsters. The end was a Waltz of the elder Strauss—music long overlooked for these concerts. It set ears tingling under Mr. Koussevitzky's sustaining yet changeful hand. But why "The Blue Danube" when "Wiener Blut," "Südische Rosen" and "Künstlerleben" are open pages? If ever a waltz had a false reputation, it is this "Schöne Blaue Donau." Before long, unless the conductors repent themselves, it will be in the tradition.

Full Speed Ahead

The celebrated locomotive of Monsieur Honegger lately made its way from Chicago to New York—whether over the rails of the Pennsylvania or the New York Central does not appear—and was parked by Mr. Damrosch on the stage of Carnegie Hall. There at two concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra, he exhibited it to audiences that received it with joyous acclamations; yet took it no more seriously than they should. Like-minded toward "Pacific, 231" were the reviewers, according to their several temperaments and tastes. Opportunely, however, The Times put a searching question:

> In America there has been raised the hue and cry of a national music which should be racy, authentic, contemporaneous in its accents. And lo! it is a Frenchman who gives us, in tones, a quality of our civilization. Honegger did it. Where, oh where! is the oppressed American composer?

He ought to be cultivating the resource, fancy, high spirits, courage wherewith such deeds are done. Monsieur Honegger in the flesh is an abounding man.

A run over the London, Midland and Scottish has also landed "Pacific, 231," at Manchester; but Mr. Langford of The Guardian could not abide it in the sacred roundhouse of the Hallé Concerts. Never before there had he heard "such an outrageous piece of unmusical realism. It had exhilaration and at times a freedom of melody which one could think admirable, but one could by no means admire the whole." At last, the opposition has a spokesman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
NOV 5 1924

BOSTON AND LENINGRAD

From the New York Telegram.

Indignant Bostonians have protested against the use of the word Leningrad in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra, is outspoken in his earnest wish that the one-time capital of the Czars be termed St. Petersburg or Petrograd.

Mr. Koussevitzky declares that it is because of Lenine and Trotzky that he lost a fortune of a million dollars and had to leave his own country. He would tolerate no echo of Lenine in his new domain of the Boston Symphony.

And yet, heartily as one may detest the theories and practise of the junta that rules at Moscow, a fact remains a fact. Boston is as powerless to decide the name of the Russian city on the Neva as were King Canute and Dame Partington to rule the tides of mighty ocean.

Suppose William Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, expressed an unalterable belief that the New England colonies stole a march on the New Netherlands, and in consequence informed the Philharmonic board that only if they substituted New Amsterdam for New York in the title of their society would he remain as its conductor? Suppose the Washington government insisted that the Mikado reigns at Yeddo. Suppose the Germans the world over addressed letters to "Metz" and "Strassburg, Deutschland!

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 5 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

It is pleasing to note that the importance of the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the armory next Monday night is given special consideration by local people, and the result is certain to be as large and brilliant an audience as any organiation could possibly desire to appear before. The orchestra will come to Schenectady in full force, with 105 men, and will be under the remarkable leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, the newly appointed conductor of the organization, and whose work has excited such fulsome praise that it is difficult to believe.

TOWN TATTLE

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 5 1924

It was unfortunate that the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra here last Sunday did not attract a larger audience. There was by no means a scant attendance, but not so many as the merit of the performance deserved and as might have been anticipated from the fact that a new conductor was making his first appearance here. Some encouragement was to be found in the fact that the audience was not confined to those who may generally be counted upon to support a symphony concert. There were new comers, so far as personal observation went, and manifestly they were interested by the admirable performance. Whether Lowell will have another opportunity to hear the orchestra, for some time at least, is problematical. There are reports that the organization contemplates curtailing its appearances outside of Boston very materially. This, while possibly advisable from the purely artistic viewpoint, would nevertheless be a matter of regret, since the visits of the orchestra to New England cities such as our own have been of undoubted educational value.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 5 1924
TRAVELER

CHILDREN HEAR SYMPHONY PLAY

The first of this year's series of concerts for young people by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, and informal comments on the music to be played were made by Wallace Goodrich.

Mendelssohn's incidental music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" began the program. Then came the Song of the Volga Boatmen, as arranged by Stravinsky for wind instruments. Of course the children could not know that they were hearing the first Boston performance of an anticipated modern piece, but surely the familiar melody did strike them as slightly strange. The composer has stressed the power, the stark severity and the eternal striving of the song rather than its sadness, as in the version sung by Chaliapin. He has made it very brief, the orchestration extremely characteristic but simple and restrained.

Richard Burgin played the violin solo in the canzonetta from Tchaikovsky's Concerto in D major, with lovely tone.

Rimsky-Korsakoy's airy trifle, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," was given place on the program, and as at the grown-up concert a week ago Saturday, was so enthusiastically received that Mr. Koussevitzky again let precedents go by the board and repeated it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 5 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next Monday night at the State armory will take place the much anticipated concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony of 105 men under the inspired leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, and the opinion is rife that the event will go down in local history as the finest musical treat that we have ever had in this city. There is great interest in the occasion; there will be an immense attendance, and the audience will be as brilliant as it is large. No doubt much of the interest will be centered in the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky for the word has been passed that he is reckoned as one of the greatest leaders of all time, and one Boston paper claims that he is "the greatest." The concert will be given under the management of Ben Franklin, and the seat sales are being held at the stores of the Barney Company, the Wallace Company, and at Cluett and Sons.

PRIM COLL...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 5 1924

The Roman Carnival of Berlioz played by the Boston Symphony orchestra here Sunday, as the program book informed us, was originally intended as the introduction to the second act of the opera Benvenuto Cellini. Incidentally it is noticed that Benvenuto Cellini is one of the characters introduced in Edwin Justus Mayer's play "The Firebrand" which has recently been produced successfully in New York.

182
Boston Transcript Nov 6

MODEST MUSORGSKY NEWLY CAPARISONED BY MONSIEUR RAVEL

PIANO-PIECES TRANSLATED INTO ORCHESTRAL SUITE

"Pictures at an Exhibition" in Petersburg Now Wear Parisian Trappings—Backgrounds, Course, Contents and the Play of Four Masterful Hands

ABOVE all else in music, Musorgsky sought truth, freedom, progress. In the Petersburg and Moscow of the sixties and the seventies, the stand-patters belittled and otherwise reviled him; while never were their feet more firmly planted in the ruts of "the tradition." According to Mr. Montagu-Nathan, the older the music was, the more the musicians of those days venerated it. The best music of the previous generation they tolerated because it might one day become classic. All were agreed in ignoring the music of their own contemporaries. Musorgsky came directly into conflict with these conservatives. He took so radical a stand that he objected even to technique; because it made students look backward for their musical development, instead of forward. He was himself too impatient of technique to acquire any considerable knowledge of it, and in this deficiency lie a partial weakness and, at the same time, a recurring source of strength to his music. As composer with no other mind than his own, as forerunner of much music of the present, he cannot be denied. His work affirms for him.

Musorgsky was a realist. He detested mysticism, and tended toward graphic representations of movement and gesture. His piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," to be heard at the Symphony Concerts this week in the orchestral version of Monsieur Ravel, are not the least of his exercises in objective delineation by tones. Yet he was writing music, and to it emotional sensation is also necessary. From an ox-cart lumbering over a Polish steppe; from the sights and sounds of a marketplace; from ancient and hallowed gate rising upon his eyes and spirit, Musorgsky could receive it.

"Pictures at an Exhibition," ten piano pieces once played in Boston, and within memory, by Mr. Bauer, are memorial in music to Musorgsky's friend, Victor Hartmann, the architect. Shortly after Hartmann's death, his sketches and water-colors were collected and shown publicly. The composer frequented them, lingered over nine; finally found them stirring him to music-making. At the beginning he set an introduction. With Interludes, labelled "Promenades," he linked several divisions. In this prelude and these intermezzi, he reflected his own moods before the several pictures, and gave also to a series of short pieces continuity and unity. The motiv of The Introduction, variously recurring, is the binding force.

As some say, while Musorgsky wrote the music for piano, he intended ultimately to rewrite it for orchestra. In fact, the more individual and characteristic numbers imply a composer with an orchestra, rather than a piano, in mind for medium. He was, however, infirm of both will and body. When he died, "Pictures at an Exhibition" had not changed dress. As Western Europe discovered Musorgsky, and also how few symphonic pieces he had left behind, it began to repair his omission. Already Sir Henry Wood, the conductor in London, and Monsieur Ravel, the composer in Paris, have scored the "Pictures" for orchestra. An obscurer Russian, has also done the job.

After the Introduction first enters "The Gnome." Here a little dwarfed being takes his way in halting and awkward manner. The irregular rhythm portrays his clumsy steps. The trumpet has the theme of the little creature.

A Promenade leads to the second Picture, where the composer evokes the atmosphere of mediæval romance. The song of a wandering minstrel is heard, played, in Ravel's orchestration, by saxophone. The song done, a brief sally brings new voices and new life. Children, with their nurses, are playing in the garden of the Tuileries at Paris. They wrangle over their games. A truly remarkable suggestion of the shrill childish voices up and down the sunlit lanes lends vivacity and charm to the picture.

Now comes a quick change—to Polish steppes. Over a ribbon of road through the changeless plain, under as dull a sky, a peasant drives his huge bydlo—a great wagon drawn by oxen. The dull thud of the hoofs beats a steady rhythm. The driver whiles away the journey with a simple song. His chariot approaches. Louder and louder the wheels creak and the hoofs thud as his team enters into the picture. Then the music deadens and stills, as the cart disappears into the distance. Rachmaninoff has made a similar effect in his "Troika en Traineaux."

A quiet transition leads to a jolly little "Ballet of chickens in their shells," one of the masterpieces of the series—by the invention of Musorgsky in the piano-piece; by the marvellous orchestration with which Monsieur Ravel has clothed it.

Poland again. Two Polish Jews—the one wealthy and well content; the other poor and unhappy—are in talk. The first, Goldenberg, expands in the full choirs of winds and strings. He is nigh to bursting with pompous patronage. For contrast, his friend, Schmyil, speaks by way of muted trumpet, with accompanying clarinet and bassoons. The strife of tongues continues. Soon both speak together. The "conversation" ends fortissimo and shrill. In the music flip the gestures.

Suddenly, without any transition, Musorgsky and Ravel evoke a new atmosphere—a market place where women and peddlers haggle. Confusion reigns. Ravel [illegible] Musorgsky's vein; maybe, imagines a little for himself; is a marvel of harmonic and instrumental devices.

In the Eighth Picture, "Catacombs in Paris," Hartmann has limned himself wandering about the subterranean passages, lantern in hand. Musorgsky makes him speak to the dead bones, "Con Mortuis in Lingua Mortua." Lights shining from the rows of skulls are heard as shimmering tremolo from the violins. The saxophone again enters.

The next Picture gives us "Baba Yaga," the witch of Russia, who travels about in her mortar frightening, kidnapping and, on occasion, eating children. Celesta, xylophone, tam-tam, harps, are forthwith added to Monsieur Ravel's choirs. The old witch of Russian folk-lore—whom Lyadov has also caught into tones—vanishes. For final turn, Musorgsky sets before the Bohatyr Gate of Kiev, chief and ancient portal to the city. A Russian epic style, recalling the old church modes, establishes a new atmosphere. The wind choirs, which begin alone, are interrupted by religious song. The ecclesiastical melody passes from one group of instruments to another. Slower, ampler, more impressive grow the periods. The finale rounds in music of power and sweep.

Parisians consider Ravel's transformation of these piano-pieces one of his finest contributions to modern music. Upon those pages, they say, he has surpassed himself in the intuitive and suggestive orchestration of which he is past master. Typically French as is his procedure, he still keeps the flavor and spirit of Musorgsky's sketches. Yet "Pictures at an Exhibition" have not been extolled always and everywhere. Some call them formless, incomprehensible. But they are picturesque, inventive, unbelievably descriptive. Now and again Musorgsky's theories have crept into the music. Few will discover them. None will find them bar to pleasure. C. S. S.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
NOV 6 1924

Forthcoming Program Of Boston Symphony Charming Combination

The program of the Boston Symphony Concert in Bailey Hall on November 12 presents an interesting and varied combination of classic and modern music. Of the program Prof. Otto H. Kinkelday says:

"The music of the 18th century is represented by a so-called concerto orchestra by Philip Emmanuel Bach, the best known of the sons of the great John Sebastion. Philip Emanuel's place in the development of music is marked by his departure from the style of his illustrious father. The severity of John Sebastian's idiom gives place to a lighter, more sprightly form of musical expression, which Philip Emannuel acquired by a closer imitation of the contemporary French style in music, the "galant" style it was called in those days. The Concerto was originally written in three short movements for strings only. No single individual assumes the solo role as in a modern concerto, but small groups of solo players now and then take up the thread of this musical "galanterie" and justify the title. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a modern arrangement by the Russian composer, Maximilian Sternberg, who has enriched and enlivened the whole work by the addition of wind instruments.

"The classic and the romantic types are represented on the program by Beethoven and Brahms. Beethoven's overture to Goethe's drama "Egmont" is still one of the master's most popular works in this form. Brahm's last symphony, the fourth, in E minor, though not so lovable as the second, is preferred by many for the wealth and variety of its themes and characteristic Brahmsian orchestral colors. At its first performance the audience clamored for a repetition of the merry third movement. While the last movement, a set of some thirty variations on a simple theme of eight chords announced by the wind instruments, puzzled the formalists but intrigued the naive hearer by its Kaleidoscopic effects.

"The novel work which will be played between the Beethoven overture and the Brahms symphony is the strange and unfortunate Moussorgsky's suite 'Pictures at an Exposition.' The composer Boris Godunov after visiting an exhibition of drawings by his deceased friend, the architect Victor Hartmann, attempted to describe his impressions in music for the piano. They were weird drawings, some of them, and others were comical. The music is equally weird or comical. The French composer Maurice Ravel has arranged them for a modern orchestra. This is the catalogue of the pictures.

"1—A clumsy gnome with twisted legs; 2—An old castle and a singing troubadour; 3—Children disputing in the Tuileries; 4—A polish ox cart; 5—Ballet of chickens in their shells; 6—Samuel Goldenberg, a rich Polish Jew and his poor neighbor Schmuyle; 7—Limousin market women in a quarrel; 8—Catacombs; 9—The hut on fowls' legs of the Russian witch, Baba Yaga; 10—The Bohatyr's gate at Kiev."

Tickets for the concert are on sale at the Co-Op and the Corner Bookstore.

LANCASTER, PA.
NEWS ERA
NOV 6 1924

INTERESTING PROGRAMS BY NEW BOSTON CONDUCTOR

Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought a large quantity of music from Europe with him, and it is assured there will be much interest in the season's programs. He will introduce to America such scores as Honneger's Pacific 231; Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, arranged by Ravel, and new music of Prokofieff, Bax, Respighi, de Falla and Vermeulen.

Other composers to be included are Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, Wagner and Berlioz. There will be standard symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Bruckner, Elgar and so forth. Music by American composers will be well represented.

When Koussetvitzky conducted his own orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd, his programs were celebrated for their unusual scope and inclusiveness. He then gave additional series each spring of the principal works of a single composer, such as Bach, Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Tschaikowsky. In Paris and London more recently Loussevitzky was noted as a conductor of great range and sympathy for the composers of each epoch and each nationality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY NOV. 10

Serge Koussevitzky Will Conduct Concert in Schenectady Armory

On account of the fact that Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in this section in Schenectady, with the orchestra at the state armory, Monday evening, Nov. 10, under the management of Ben Franklin, as well as for general knowledge, a few facts in regard to the famous artist will prove of interest.

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tver, North Russia in 1874. He received his first musical knowledge at home. At the age of 12 he became concert master of the theater orchestra of his native town, a post that he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theater and to conduct the entr'actes. At 14 he went to Moscow to continue his studies, and he chose for special study the double-bass. On this he developed extraordinary ability, and became double-bass soloist of the orchestra at the Imperial opera at Moscow. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became famous; it was made up of the best players from other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year, and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or to any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky. In 1921 he founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous. Then he divided his time between Paris and London, being equally successful in each town, and he has conducted in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, and Warsaw.

The seat sale for the concert is being held at the Schenectady store of Cluett and Sons, but Albany patrons may phone or mail orders to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, and he will give these requests his personal attention.

Boston Transcript Nov 6

Incidents and Prospects

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week there will be no Symphony Concerts. From Monday through Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra wil wander westward—to Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo, Pittsburgh: cities to which a conductor of his note and powers comes seldom. These journeys are taxing, and at the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Nov. 21, and Saturday, Nov. 22, the program will run lightly. For novel piece it contains nothing more exacting than a little eighteenth-century Symphony by Boccherini—in C-major, Op. 16; No. 3—one of Mr. Koussevitzky's pet discoveries. Upon four familiar numbers, however, he will lay a transforming hand; Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel"; Debussy's Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl"; Mozart's Overture to "Figaro's Wedding."

Mr. Martino and his Eighteenth-Century

Boston Herald Nov 6

[illegible] vices."

[illegible] Koussevitzky evidently was greatly pleased at rehearsal with Arensky's Variations on a Theme by Tchaikovsky which was announced for performance at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, for he dropped the piece from the program, which now stands as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Mozart, Symphony, G minor; Debussy, Two Nocturnes; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Ravel (first time in America).

Moussorgsky was a great friend of the architect, Victor Hartmann, who died in 1873. An exhibition of Hartmann's drawings and pictures was held in his memory, and Moussorgsky, wishing to pay tribute to his friend, wrote 10 piano pieces, naming each one after a picture, and introducing them with "Fromenade," which is supposed to suggest the gait of the spectator and impressions made on him. "The composer," says Stassov, "here shows himself walking to and fro, now loitering, now hurrying to examine a congenial work. Sometimes his gait slackens; Moussorgsky is thinking sadly of his dear friend."

These pieces were entitled, Gnomus, The Old Castle; Tuileries, representing sports and quarrels of children in the gardens; Byalo, a Polish cart with huge wheels drawn by oxen; Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells, intended for a ballet "Trilby"; Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, representing two Polish Jews, one fat and prosperous, the other lean and begging; Bickering Marketwomen at Limoges; The Catacombs, showing Hartmann visiting the catacombs in Paris by the light of a lantern; The Hut on Fowls' Legs, a design for a clock in the shape of Baba-Yaga's hut. (She was a witch, fond of collecting human bones, traveling about in a mortar, which she urged on with the pestle—Liadov's musical sketch named after her has been performed here at Symphony concerts); and the Bogatyr's Gate at Kiev—the drawing was a proposed design for a massive gate whose cupola was in the shape of a Slavonic helmet.

The piano pieces were brought out in Boston by Harold Bauer.

Eight of them were orchestrated by Touschmalov and performed at Leningrad in 1891. Sir Henry Wood then tried his hand at orchestration for London. Ravel, well acquainted with Russian music, in conversation with Mr. Koussevitzky, expressed his liking for these "Pictures" and gladly accepted Mr. Koussevitzky's invitation to orchestrate them. Ravel's arrangement was produced by Mr. Koussevitzky at one of his concerts in Paris (May 3, 1923). A still later orchestration is by Leonidas Leornadi, a pianist and composer in Paris, who conducted his work in that city last June.

Notes and Lines:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS
NOV 6 1924

Editorial Mirror

A WORDY BATTLE

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought thru the foyers of Boston Symphony hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Mr. Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, altho his interpretations are various received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program book aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nnr misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the post-office department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, howevermuch one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Braynville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation Braynville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles. — SPRINGFIELD UNION.

In a new play a real mon[illegible]

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 6 1924

Incidents and Prospects

On Friday afternoon and Saturday eve[illegible]ning of next week there will be no Sym[illegible]phony Concerts. From Monday through Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra wil wander westward—to Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo, Pittsburgh: cities to which a conductor of his note and powers comes seldom. These journeys are taxing, and at the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Nov. 21, and Saturday, Nov. 22, the program will run lightly. For novel piece it contains nothing more exacting than a little eighteenth-century Symphony by Boccherini—in C-major, Op. 16; No. 3—one of Mr. Koussevitzky's pet discoveries. Upon four familiar numbers, however, he will lay a transforming hand; Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel"; Debussy's tone-poem, "The Sea"; Wagner's Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"; Mozart's Overture to "Siegfried Idyl"; Mozart's Overture to "Figaro's Wedding."

Mr. Martino and his Eighteenth-Century Symphony Orchestra are ready to resume their concerts of ancient music in the smaller and better attuned auditorium of Jordan Hall. There they will make new beginning on Wednesday evening, Dec. 3. Back even to a Venetian of the fifteenth century, Giovanni Gabrieli, will they go for a nine-voiced piece.

The People's Symphony Orchestra is again taking courage with itself and its public. Next Sunday afternoon it will play nothing less at the St. James Theater than Frank's testing tone-poem, "Daughters of Æolus." Again no Symphony stands on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
NOV 1924

Best Editorials of the Day

A WORDY BATTLE.

It was an amusing battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Mr. Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are variously received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies be provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the Postoffice Department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State Street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the Czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, however much one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles.—Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A visit to the seat sales being conducted at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and the Wallace Company for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the armory Monday night, will readily convince the visitor of the immense interest in the concert, the indications being that the house will be sold out before Saturday. The program of the event will include the concerto in D major by C. P. A. Bach, and arranged by Maximilian Sternberg; the overture to Weber's "Oberon", Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and a group of Russian pieces which the great Russian conductor has brought to America with him, and which are replete with character and charm. They include: Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky; Rachmaninov's "Vocalize;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Dubinouchka;" Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina;" and Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee."

"Vocalize," the wordless song of Rachmaninov, which is well known the world over, was arranged by the composer for orchestra, while he was in Russia, especially for Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in Moscow in the season of 1915-16.

"Dubinouchka" is the name of the policeman's club which was often felt and feared in Russia under the imperial regime. This folk song was another version of the song of the Volga Bargemen, "Ay—ouchnem." Rimsky-Korsakov presents it in a march rhythm. The revolutionary version came later.

The two great monuments of Moussorgsky's genius are his operas, "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. The piece has its distinct color and mood suggestive of the subject.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is a little Scherzo from Dimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera Tsar Sultan in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. The charm of this tiny piece is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitsky performed it in Boston, an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the first beginnings of the orchestra, 40 years ago.

CLIPPING FROM
GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 6 1924

he ceremony.

ST. MARY'S STUDENTS WILL HEAR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Several students of St. Mary's Music department will go to Schenectady Monday evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays in the armory there on that evening. This is another instance of the consistency of study in St. Mary academy. The students are encouraged to take advantage of every opportunity to improve their appreciation by hearing the best music possible as well as to study it. Autos will leave St. Mary's academy at 5:30 o'clock Monday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
NOV 6

Boston Symphony Concert in Schenectady.

As is usual at the more important concerts in Schenectady, the audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the state armory in that city next Monday night, will contain a large delegation from Amsterdam, and the importance of the occasion justifies the journey.

The seat sales are being conducted at the stores of Cluett & Sons, the Wallace company and at the Barney company, and all will accept mail and 'phone orders, this in order to accommodate out of town patronage. The program of the concert will include the Overture to "Oberon," by Weber; the Concerto in D major by C. P. A. Bach; the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, and a group of Russian which Conductor Koussevitzky has brought to America with him, and which are replete with character and charm. They include: Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky; Rachmaninov's "Vocalize;" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Dubinouchka;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 7 1924

HONEGGER'S "Pacific 231" was again repeated at the first of the Symphony Society Thursday matinees in Carnegie Hall. When Mr. Damrosch by chance lays his conductor's hand upon a popular novelty he is certain to get its full value from it—it is good for at least two performances in each of the subscription series of his orchestra.

The music with which Honegger has evoked the "visual impression and physical sensation" of a locomotive retains its impressiveness after several hearings, and urges one the more strongly to hear another director—say Sergi Koussewitsky—give his version of it. For the performance, not alone of Honegger but of the entire program yesterday, was far below par.

Particularly in the accompaniment to the Schumann Concerto, played by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, did the band show need of more careful rehearsing, more discipline, more vigor from its conductor. All too frequently the orchestra played and Damrosch waved his arms in merry obbligato. The wood wind groups were sadly uneven in attack, failing to come in instantly upon the beat (which Mr. Damrosch did not properly indicate). In the strings, details were slurred over where such a proceeding was opposed to the character of the music—the theme, for instance, of the concerto's last movement must be played staccato and not be a lazy legato. Mr. Gabrilowitsch labored under the difficulty of this accompainment and gave a poetic, individual interpretation of this romantic masterpiece.

The complete program included the "Fingal's Cave" overture of Mendelssohn, Haydn's "London" Symphony and an adagio for strings by Lekeu.

CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 7 1924

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

In Many Modes and Musics

THE crescent appreciation of Mr. Koussevitzky continues. In Sanders Theater, at the second concert of the Cambridge season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he gained last evening in that quarter, further satisfactions in such portion of his audience as wished to hear more of his readings in the classics. Indeed, perhaps the most paradoxical turn in the criticisms of his work that preceded him in the United States, was the insistence on the fact that a man who had, in the last few years, particularly, devoted so much attention to the scores of the moderns and ultra-moderns, could, at the same time, give the strictest classical interpretation of Brahms and Beethoven. Could it be possible that the hysterical emotion and inordinate ecstasy usually associated with the more florescent things of Prokoviev, Skryabin, Stravinsky, and Bliss, might not carry over into the reading of the more rigorous line of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Brahms's Fourth? The strictest conformist in literature, at the time when he is writing, is a romantic. He cannot well be otherwise. By newer and later standards he becomes to varying degree a classicist. Mr. Newman applies such a doctrine to the composer of music. But the conductor can be neither alone. He must feed on the same stuff that nourishes the experimenter, the radical; and, similarly, he should be exceedingly close to the spirit of composers of another generation if he would be a recognized protagonist. Certainly Mr. Koussevitzky is that. Indeed, in the very fact that his head completely commands his heart, that in the bewilderment of wild light dancing on the dissonances of some latter-day piece, he is positive and certain of his step, is the finest possible assurance that he must be intellectually close to the spirit of the original of whatever comes to hand.

At last evening's concert Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Fourth, E Minor, Symphony of Brahms, placing it in the sunny position of last on the program. From the outset to the end he laid particular emphasis on the color that hovers about the constant recurrence of theme, the clarion intonation of horns in the second andante movement, the strepitant, sporadic outbursts of brass, and the scattering flute notes. He found, too, an impelling glorification in it, less the insistent tragedy of life that Brahms's biographer, Kalbeck, there discovered; more of the ascendant carnival tone and exaltation. In the final movement, especially, the conductor lapsed into a pronouncedly methodical mood with an easier tempo than is usually taken, perhaps as an additional accentuation of its majestic proportions.

For the earlier half of the program Mr. Koussevitzky selected a number of things. First, he played the D major Concerto of Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach, son of John Sebastian, as arranged by Steinberg at Mr. Koussevitzky's request. It is a rather lovely thing with a middle andante movement quite superior to the rest of it in point of inspiration. It sounded, perhaps, strange in its augmented state; and the third, and allegro, movement generated less charm in substance than in animation of rhythm. The ecstatic heights of Wagner were climbed again in "Der Venusberg" from "Tannhauser." Mr. Koussevitzky is here supreme, and stands in the midst of Wagnerian splendor as one who again and again rears up some towering battlement only to crash it to the ground. There is not other way to describe it. The complete inoscillation of brass which he sets forth above strings and wood-wind is superb, and the effect of its multiple yet sword-edged tone as it rises, shatters and fails, is interminable. "Der Venusberg," after its ultimate descent from chaotic glory, suffers the fate of protraction. It is too long, and even the beauty of its more modulated measures, delicately phrased as they were, cannot then quite save it from itself.

Musorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanchina" is a rather suggestive picture of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin in Moscow. A certain dire import sounds in the basses, captured and quickened by the kettle drum. That delightful excerpt from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," was exquisitely painted. W. H. Hudson himself, who delighted so infinitely in the sounds and volutions of insects, must have marvelled at this. The strings, it is apparent, sketch the line-flight of the bee; the buzzing tremolo, darting suddenly into a run on the flute, then closely approximates its varying loops and swirls, and final dash. Mr. Laurent did adequate justice to the part. The "Flight" was repeated (as when Mr. Koussevitzky played it in Paris and in Boston), surely an almost unremembered event in Sanders Theater.

D. McC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
NOV 7 1924

183

A WORDY BATTLE.

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are various received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the postoffice department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State Street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the Czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, however much one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles.—Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
NOV 7 1924

MUSIC

By F. W. S.

NEXT WEEK will bring to this city the second of the large out-of-town organizations which have become a feature of the musical life of Baltimore, this being the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, and there will remain only the visit of the New York Philharmonic, of which the scholarly Willem Mengelberg is the leader, and the appearance, late in the season, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new captain, Serge Koussevitzki, which is on the season's schedule for a single concert, to complete the list of large orchestral bodies to afford the Monumental City an opportunity of hearing big works in an adequate setting.

The New York Symphony Orchestra will makes its seasonal bow on next Wednesday evening at the Lyric, and Mr. Damrosch has arranged a program that combines compositions rarely heard here with others which have been given again and again, and with which the public is, therefore, fairly familiar.

184

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD

NOV 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Concert at Bailey Hall, Ithaca, on Wednesday, Nov. 12

The winter series of concerts put on at Bailey hall, Ithaca, by Cornell university, will begin on Wednesday evening, Nov. 12, by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. This is the forty-fourth season of this world famous orchestra. At this concert this conductor, a European celebrity, will be seen for his first season in America. He is considered the most striking figure and dominant personality in the recent orchestral concerts in London and Paris. His earlier career in Russia was most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow.

The reputation of the Boston Symphony orchestra as one of the leading organizations of its kind in America and in the world is too well known to need comment.

Course tickets for the five entertainments range in price from $4 to $10 and every seat in Bailey hall is a good one to hear music.

Single tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra are now on sale at the Co-Op and the Corner Bookstore at Ithaca for from $1 to $2.50, according to location, every seat being a good one. Mail orders should be acompanied by remittance payable to Cornell university. Enclose self-addressed stamped envelope for return of tickets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 7

A WORDY BATTLE

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitsky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are variously received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What has been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the Postoffice Department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State Street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitsky. But M. Koussevitsky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the Czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, howevermuch one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic, and even musical circles.—Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A change has been made in the program of the Boston Symphony concert at the State Armory, next Monday night, that will be accepted as a decided improvement. The Overture to "Tannhauser" will not be played, but in its place will be presented the Overture to "Oberon" by Weber, and the concerto in D major by C. P. A. Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg. Otherwise the program will remain the same as that received in advance.

In speaking of the Koussevitzky interpretation of Beethoven, Henry T. Parker, critic of the Boston Transcript, said:

"Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky laid the hand of power, as one who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. At will, as in the transition from scherzo to finale, he held it almost in suspensive rustle. For it, he phrased, as by a human voice, the songful measures of the Andante. Deep were the euphonies. At every turn, moreover the conductor was master of line, progress, ascent."

A soldout house is the prediction for the Schenectady concert on Monday night, and the seat sales at Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and the Wallace Company back up the prediction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It will be well for those who have received the program of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the armory Monday night to know that there has been a change in the arrangement. The overture to Tannhauser will not be played, but in its place will be the Concerto in D major, by C. P. A. Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, and the Overture to "Oberon" by Weber. Otherwise the program will remain the same. In speaking of the Koussevitsky interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony which, by the way, will be the symphony for the concert, Philip Hale of the Boston Herald had this continent after it production in that city:

"Those who feared lest Mr. Koussevitsky would give a sensational, theatrical performance of the Fifth Symphony, that he would startle the ultra-conservative by his licentious treatment, must have been bitterly disappointed. He gave a conspicuously sane and noble performance. Perhaps the Andante was taken a shade slower than is customary—after all it is an Andante con moto—but by his choice of pace fine points in the detail were deftly brought out. Admirable was his contrasting the main body of the Scherzo with the tumultous Trio. The mysterious transition to the Finale was never more mysterious, and the stately beginning of the Finale for once not hurried shouting, led to a vital reading of pages that have to some seemed, when treated too respectfully, that is perfunctorily, a falling off from the grandeur of the first measures. For Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations and the orchestral performance throughout the concert there is nothing but praise."

The seat sales for the Schenectady concert, being conducted at Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company, and the Barney Company continue so active that they may be accepted as a guarantee of sold out house for the big event.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 8 1924
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

Dorp To Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra

There will be a large delegation of musical enthusiasts from Albany in attendance at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 men, under the superb direction of Serge Koussevitzy, at the State armory, Schenectady, Monday night, and the importance of the event justifies the journey. The concert will mark the first appearance of Koussevitzky in the Albany radius, and his coming has aroused intense interest. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin, and orders for tickets may be sent to him at 18 Chestnut st. The Schenectady seat sales are being held at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company and the Barney Company and it is well to remember that cars of the Schenectady Traction company pass the door of the armory. The program will be as follows:

Concerto for orchestra in D major, arr. by Steinberg, C.. P. A. Bach, allegro moderate, andante lento moto, allegro.

Overture to "Oberon," Weber; (a) "Vocalize," arr. by composer for orchestra, Rachmaninov; (b) "Dubinouchka" (folk song) Rimsky-Korsakev; (c) prelude to opera "Khevantchina," Moussorgsky; (d) "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from opera, "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakev.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven, allegro con brie, andante con moto, allegro; trio, allegro.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
NOV 8 1924

THE program in which the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music hall next Thursday evening, November 13, under the local manaegment of Bessie Bellanca, is one which should provide ample scope for the play of Serge Koussevitzky's volcanic temperament. In the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, the Bach Concerto and the works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky and other Russian composers, the fire of the new Russian conductor's personality should find its fullest opportunity for expression. There has been so much discussion of Koussevitsky's temperament it is interesting to read Ernest Newman's comment in a recent issue of the "American Mercury." The great English music critic says: "America will find Koussevitsky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I have often found myself disagreeing with him, but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all."

"Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying, apropos of 'Tristan,' 'Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been cold as ice.' What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master."

One of the Russian works included in the program, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is a charming Scherzo from the composer's fairy opera "Tsar Sultan." When this piece was performed in Boston recently Koussevitzky was forced by persistent applause to grant an encore. It was the first time the Boston Symphony had given an encore in 40 years.

The program for Thursday evening reads:

Bach C. P. E. .....
Concerto for Orchestra in D Major
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto.
III. Allegro.
Weber .....Overture to "Oberon"
Rachmaninov ..... "Vocalise"
(Arranged for Orchestra by the Composer)
Rimsky-Korsakov ..... "Dubinouchka"
(Russian Folk Song)
Moussorgsky .....
Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov .....
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee"
Scherzo from the Opera "Tsar Sultan"
Beethoven .....
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
III. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
NOV 8 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SCHENECTADY

Many From This City Will Hear Famous Orchestra at State Armory.

The program of the concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 men, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the state armory, Schenectady, Monday night is designed to interest every one in the vast audience that will be in attendance, and that will include a large delegation from this city. The occasion will mark the first appearance of Koussevitzky in this section and his appearance is awaited with keen interest. The seat sales for the concert are being conducted at the stores of the Barney company, the Wallace company and Cluett & Sons, Schenectady, where telephone orders will be accepted, and the tickets held until called for. This is the admirable program of the concert and it justifies a journey to enjoy it.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 8 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Russian scores will be featured at each of the coming concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Syria Mosque next Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Friday concert there will be played Moussorgsky's piano suite, Pictures at an exhibition, as arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel the French composer. A number of pictures are described in a few stories of apt and witty musical characterization, while between each, the "promenade" is repeated as the beholder walks from one picture to the next. At the Saturday afternoon concert there will be played Arensky's variations on a theme of Tchaikovsky, the prelude to "Khovantchina" by Moussorgsky," and Rimsky-Korsakow's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
NOV 8 1924

Mr. Koussevitzky in a Conventional Program

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Beethoven,
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"
Mozart.....Symphony in G Minor
Debussy,
Two Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fêtes")
Moussorgsky,
"Pictures at an Exhibition" (orchestrated by Ravel)

This was by far the most taxing program Mr. Koussevitzky has thus far attempted, as it consisted for the most part of music which scarcely provides opportunities for the display of those qualities peculiar to himself (we will hardly venture on the word "tricks") in which Mr. Koussevitzky delights. There were no tremendous climaxes to be worked up, no startling examples of modernity to disturb the comfortable enjoyment of the afternoon, for Debussy's Nocturnes are now accepted as regular members of the repertory along with Haydn symphonies and the overtures of Weber. Even Moussorgsky's "Exhibition" is conventional enough except in the titles of its several parts. It does, in passing, contain one movement which is sure to endear Mr. Koussevitzky still further to the patrons of these concerts—the "ballet of chickens in their shells"—if that were still possible since his playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," which now bids fair to be the most popular and successful number in his repertory.

Be it to Mr. Koussevitzky's credit that, there being no suitable opportunities for the introduction of Koussevitzkyisms, he refrained from them. But alas! how tame, after the last four weeks. Even in this short period we have grown accustomed to a highly spiced musical diet and this sudden return to a Mozart symphony played in the most conventional of conventional manners, save for one meaningless little hurrying in the first movement, is disconcerting. Already we expect our Mozart, our Beethoven, our Weber, à la Koussevitzky, but it appears that Mr. Koussevitzky has not yet worked out a version of the Mozart G minor Symphony. Truth to tell, a conductor of the virtuoso type, as Mr. Koussevitzky most certainly is, is bound to find it difficult to sustain the interest of 24 successive concerts. They cannot all consist of the pieces or of the kind of music in which he excels and there are bound to be dull moments. It is taxing on all concerned when the chief interest of the concert centers around the conductor, and this is not said in disparagement of the present conductor of the symphony concerts, who is to be taken as he is. It was felt that a conductor of "personality" was needed for these concerts. A conductor of undoubted personality has most undoubtedly been secured.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is only mildly exciting. Even Ravel's orchestration only slightly increases the interest, masterly though it is. Its coloring is familiar, and brilliant as it is, it scarcely conceals the poverty of the harmonic and melodic framework which it is designed to clothe. So Moussorgsky is a great musical genius! The greater part of his music has been arranged or rewritten by someone else, and even so its originality is difficult to discover. Is not this veneration of Moussorgsky somewhat of a pose on the part of a certain group of musicians and writers, just as the Parisian "Six" are said to hold in particular esteem the music of Ambroise Thomas and Mendelssohn, an attitude which it is difficult to believe is sincere.

One more question. Why did not Mr. Koussevitsky permit the audience to applaud between the two Nocturnes of Debussy. There is perhaps a shadow of a reason for not permitting applause between the several movements of a symphony, though in the "classic" symphony at least there is little real relationship between them. But Debussy's Nocturnes are two distinct compositions. Applause is no more disturbing than the rustling and general squirming which now takes its place. S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
NOV 8 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE 13TH

The program in which the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music hall next Thursday evening, Nov. 13th under the local management of Bessie Bellanca is one which should provide ample scope for the play of George Koussevitzky's volcanic temperament. In the Beethoven 5th Symphony, the Bach Concerto and the works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky and other Russian composers, the controlled fire of the new Russian conductor's personality should find its fullest opportunity for expression.

One of the Russian works included in the program, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff is a charming Scherzo from the composer's fairy opera "Tsar Sultan." When this piece was performed in Boston recently Koussevitzky was forced by persistent applause to grant an encore, the first time the Boston Symphony had given an encore in 40 years.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop 230 Delaware avenue.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 8 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ON THURSDAY

The program in which the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music hall next Thursday evening, November 13 under the local management of Bessie Bellanca is one which should provide ample scope for the play of Serge Koussevitzky's volcanic temperament. In the Beethoven fifty symphony, the Bach concerto and the works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky and other Russian composers, the controlled fire of the new Russian conductor's personality should find its fullest opportunity for expression. There has been so much discussion of Koussevitzky's nervous intensity, it is interesting to read Ernest Newman's comment in a recent issue of the "American Mercury."

One of the Russian works included in the program, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff is a charming Scherzo from the composer's fairy opera "Tsar Sultan." When this piece was performed in Boston recently Koussevitzky was forced by persistent applause to grant an encore, the first time the Boston symphony had given an encore in forty years.

The program reads:

Concerto for Orchestra in D major .....Bach, C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
Allegro moderato
Andante lento moto
Allegro
Overture to "Obero".....Weber
"Vocalize" ..... Rachmaninov
(Arranged for orchestra by the composer.)
"Dubinouchka" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
(Russian Folk Song.)
Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina"; ..... Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee"... ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
(Scherzo from the Opera "Tsar Sultan.")
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Andante can moto
Allegro; Trio
Allegro.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Literary Digest
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 8 1924

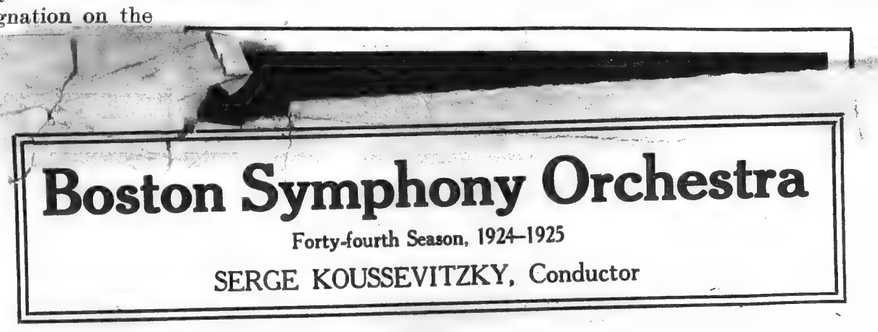
"LENINGRAD IN BOSTON"

MUSICAL BOSTON HAS BREWED a little tempest in her teapot over a geographical name. In the Boston Symphony Orchestra program-books appeared the word "Leningrad," and at once it was suspected that some subtle Bolshevist propaganda was being inspired by the new Russian leader, Koussevitzky. Forgetting that the word must be inscribed on any letter destined to reach the City of Peter the Great, the designation on the concert pro… dangerous p… tenay Gui' Handel a… of the … this pr… Bulleti… pay re… please … Symph… be desir… conduct… doubted … Russian … as the cl… erstwhile… to the m… papers, … of sacrifi… to the w… power in … especially … himself is … to his radi… Transcript… in a calm t…

"Musica… and progra… as a rule, … politics, or… politics, int… or their p… policy woul… bells sadly … can not ima… of a certa… program ha… intention… to stand fo… the Great … pious mod… the church … of the great … revolution l… secularized, … founder by … of Peter; an… andria, and … man who ha…

"But whe… the prosperit… removed to M… ment farther … it nearer to t… of communist … country. Pe… however, unt… ary Russia, … conception o… the city of L… of her greatn… consummated. By Soviet edict, Petrograd became Leningrad. It was an insult not only to the name and fame of Peter, but to the great Russian nation; it was an insult to Europe and to the world.

"The name is, however, now established in a manner as official as any that is possible in existing Russia. It is the nam… to which the long-suffering inhabitants of what was once S… Petersburg are compelled to submit. If formally we call th… city by either of its old designations, we are calling it by a nam… that has ceased to exist officially. On the other hand, he who i… any sort of document of the time uses the word 'Leningrad' merely… falls in with the requirement of actuality and can not be accused… of taking part in any Sovietish conspiracy. The disturbance… over the use of the word in a musical program is a tempest in a… teapot. In view of the keen and well-warranted aversion… which the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, himself a Rus… orthy and honored … he use of the name, … em as if a point … been strained and … voided. But the … is program prob… thought of that. … ve to take an en… sort of will for … antime, it is open … look forward with … time when Russia … o her senses and … for the historical … t which time the … in will assuredly … m the city by … hich is Russia's … rd Europe and … the name of … ss restored to … ropriate fashion. … epresents a na… re; it will pass … tmare passed in … might have re… is Robespierre-… uld not be ex… uch a chance as … affords; and so … erald tries to … the plight of … naker in this … rs to come the … agton, District … uld be changed … capital would … reign and do… reminiscent of … if Mr. Guild … to censor the … ; and finally … of Conductor … ary for him to … on't play till … brewing: … me one sug… the city on … ne else dis… come into its … out of the … programs altogether; but dear, dear! what would the erudite Mr. Philip Hale do when it came time to spell out in glib phrases the career of some new Russian creation which M Koussevitzky chose to produce before his public? No, the issue can not be dodged, and the old seat of the Czars must be mentioned in some way or other."



Boston Symphony Orchestra

Forty-fourth Season, 1924–1925

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Burgin, R. Concert-master.	Hoffmann, J.	Gerardi, A.	Hamilton, V.
Theodorowicz, J.	Mahn, F.	Krafft, W.	Sauvlet, H.
Gundersen, R.	Pinfield, C.	Fiedler, B.	Siegl, F.
Kassman, N.	Cherkassky, P.	Leveen, P.	Mariotti, V.
Thillois, F.	Gorodetzky, L.	Kurth, R.	Riedlinger, H.
Murray, J.	Goldstein, S.	Bryant, M.	Knudsen, C.
Stonestreet, L.	Tapley, R.	Del Sordo, R.	Messina, S.
Diamond, S.	Erkelens, H.	Seiniger, S.

VIOLAS.

Fourel, G.	Werner, H.	Grover, H.	Fiedler, A.
Artières, L.	Van Wynbergen, C.	Shirley, P.	Mullaly, J.
	Gerhardt, S.	Kluge, M.
	Deane, C.	Zahn, F.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Bedetti, J.	Keller, J.	Belinski, M.	Warnke, J.	Langendœn, J.
Schroeder, A.	Barth, C.	Stockbridge, C.	Fabrizio, E.	Marjollet, L.

BASSES.

Kunze, M.	Seydel, T.	Ludwig, O.	Kelley, A.	Girard, H.
Keller, K.	Gerhardt, G.	Frankel, I.	Demetrides, L.

FLUTES.	OBOES.	CLARINETS.	BASSOONS.
Laurent, G.	Longy, G.	Sand, A.	Laus, A.
Bladet, G.	Lenom, C.	Arcieri, E.	Allard, R.
Amerena, P.	Stanislaus, H.	Vannini, A.	Bettoney, F.

PICCOLO.	ENGLISH HORNS.	BASS CLARINET.	CONTRA-BASSOON.
Battles, A.	Mueller, F.	Mimart, P.	Piller, B.
	Speyer, L.

HORNS.	HORNS.	TRUMPETS.	TROMBONES.
Wendler, G.	Valkenier, W.	Mager G.	Hampe, C.
Schindler, G.	Hain, F.	Mann, J.	Adam, E.
Hess, M.	Van Den Berg, C.	Schmeisser, K.	Mausebach, A.
Lorbeer, H.	Gebhardt, W.	Perret, G.	Kenfield, L.
		Kloenfel, L.

TUBA.	HARPS.	TIMPANI.	PERCUSSION.
Sidow, P.	Holy, A.	Ritter, A.	Ludwig, C.	Zahn, F.
	Savitzkaya, L.	Polster, M.	Sternburg, S.

ORGAN.	CELESTA.	LIBRARIAN.
Snow, A.	Fiedler, A.	Rogers, L. J.

3

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 8 - 1924

IN MUSICAL TROY.

Boston Symphony to Open Troy's Music Season Next Tuesday Night —Assisting Artists for Vocal Society's First Concert—Music Study Club to Present Interesting Program—Music in the Churches.

The Boston Symphony, which is to appear in Music Hall Tuesday evening at the initial concert of the Chromatic Club's season, has had many renowned conductors, but if the opinion of some of the world's greatest musicians and outstanding music critics can be used as a criterion, Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Symphony this season, is the most striking figure among conductors on both sides of the Atlantic. Koussevitsky is now in America for his first season and has come here direct from triumphs abroad. His earlier career in Russia was perhaps the most conspicuous in the now famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow, where he assembled his country's best musicians and drilled them into a remarkable organization. After Karl Muck's departure from this country during the war the question as to his successor was a serious problem to the Symphony management. Last season Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony. When the announcement was made of Koussevitsky's appointment to conduct the forces this season the Symphony management was overwhelmed with messages of congratulation. The Boston Symphony has long been hailed as the leading Symphony in this country, and the concert Tuesday night will undoubtedly prove the merit of this praise. Trojans are indeed fortunate that the Chromatic Club selected this renowned orchestra with its world-famed conductor to officially open the music season here.

The program follows:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, Bach C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante lento moto
III. Allegro

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84, Beethoven

"Pictures at An Exhibition," Moussorgsky
(Arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel)

Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 38, Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico epassionate

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 8 - 1924

The first important musical event of the season in Troy will take place Tuesday evening when the Chromatic organization will bring to Music Hall the well known and much favored Boston Symphony Orchestra with the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. M. Koussevitsky has been called the world's greatest conductor and he comes to lead an orchestra that has grown into an honored institution in the musical circles of the country. The program that the orchestra and its brilliant leader will present includes the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor. This symphony was also given at the first concert of the season in Boston. The city papers in reviewing the concert said:

"A precedent was created at the first Boston Symphony concert last night when a composition had to be repeated owing to the insistent applause of the audience. This honor fell to the Brahms No. 4 in E minor. This new conductor does not treat his classics with fossilized reverence. He brings to them an inexhaustible freshness and vitality. He infused into Brahms an unceasing emotional and dramatic eloquence."

Since the opening concert in October, M. Kousevitsky has been calling forth the startled admiration of musical critics and the applause of those who appreciate symphony music led by the tremendous personality of a genius who combines an affection for modern music with a sympathy for and appreciation of the classics.

The program of the concert will be:

Bach. C. P. E.—Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Andante lento moto.
3. Allegro.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84.

Moussorgsky—Pictures at an Exhibition. (Arranged for Orchestra by M. Ravel.)

Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 38.
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Andante moderato.
3. Allegro giocoso.
4 Allegro energico epassionate.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

aper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 8 1924

Orchestra Program Talk.

Symphony orchestra patrons will be interested in the program talk to be given next Tuesday evening, at 8:30, on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The talk will be given in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with illustrations played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. There is no charge for admission, and all patrons of the concerts are welcome.

Bach Organ Recital.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH,
PA.
~~POST~~
NOV 8 1924

TO TELL OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A program talk will be given Tuesday night on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque.

Traveler
Nov 8

Sixth Symphony Concert Program

The next pair of Boston symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place on Nov. 21 and 22, since the coming week will be occupied by visits to Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

The coming Boston program will include: Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy's symphonic sketch, "The Sea"; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and Strauss's symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Literary Digest
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 8 1924

"LENINGRAD IN BOSTON"

MUSICAL BOSTON HAS BREWED a little tempest in her teapot over a geographical name. In the Boston Symphony [illegible] the word "Leningrad," subtle Bolshevist propa[illegible] sian leader, Koussevit[illegible] inscribed on any lette[illegible] Great, the designation [illegible] concert program look[illegible] dangerous politics. M[illegible] tenay Guild, Presiden[illegible] Handel and Haydn So[illegible] of the Apollo Club, [illegible] this protest to the Co[illegible] Bulletin: "If we are p[illegible] pay reverence to [illegible] please the new leade[illegible] Symphony Orchestra[illegible] be desirable to look [illegible] conductor in spite o[illegible] doubted musical abil[illegible] Russian visitor." [illegible] as the change in na[illegible] erstwhile Russian cap[illegible] to the majority of th[illegible] papers, they are no[illegible] of sacrificing a musi[illegible] to the whim of the[illegible] power in present-da[illegible] especially as Mr. Ko[illegible] himself is said to le[illegible] to his radical compa[illegible] Transcript traverse[illegible] in a calm temper:

"Musical conduc[illegible] and program-mak[illegible] as a rule, fond of [illegible] politics, or even th[illegible] politics, into their [illegible] or their programs [illegible] policy would jangle [illegible] bells sadly out of [illegible] can not imagine tha[illegible] of a certain Sym[illegible] program had any [illegible] intentions when t[illegible] to stand for the n[illegible] the Great and [illegible] pious modesty—[illegible] the church after [illegible] of the great and p[illegible] revolution bore[illegible] secularized, de-[illegible] founder by being [illegible] of Peter; and the [illegible] andria, and Cons[illegible] man who had ma[illegible]

"But when the [illegible] the prosperity, of [illegible] removed to Mose[illegible] ment farther from [illegible] it nearer to the breeding-place of the [illegible] of communists who had come to control the destinies of the country. Petrograd was left to freeze and rot. It was not, however, until the death of Lenin, the evil genius of revolutionary Russia, that the Soviet mind had compassed the monstrous conception of bestowing such a name as Leningrad, meaning the city of Lenin, upon the pride of modern Russia, the home of her greatness. But this idea was no sooner thought of than consummated. By Soviet edict, Petrograd became Leningrad. It was an insult not only to the name and fame of Peter, but to the great Russian nation; it was an insult to Europe and to the world.

"The name is, however, now established in a manner as official as any that is possible in existing Russia. It is the nam[illegible] to which the long-suffering inhabitants of what was once S[illegible] Petersburg are compelled to submit. If formally we call th[illegible] city by either of its old designations, we are calling it by a nam[illegible] that has ceased to exist officially. On the other hand, he who i[illegible] [illegible] the ti[illegible] [illegible] merely [illegible] accused [illegible] rbance [illegible] t in a [illegible] rsion [illegible] the [illegible] Mr. [illegible] us- [illegible] red [illegible] me, [illegible] oint [illegible] nd [illegible] the [illegible] ob- [illegible] hat. [illegible] en- [illegible] l for [illegible] pen [illegible] with [illegible] ussia [illegible] and [illegible] rical [illegible] the [illegible] redly [illegible] by [illegible] ussia's [illegible] and [illegible] ue of [illegible] d to [illegible] shion. [illegible] a na- [illegible] l pass [illegible] sed in [illegible] ve re- [illegible] pierre- [illegible] be ex- [illegible] nce as [illegible] and so [illegible] ies to [illegible] ht of [illegible] this [illegible] me the [illegible] District [illegible] hanged [illegible] would [illegible] and do- [illegible] scent of [illegible] Guild [illegible] asor the [illegible] l finally [illegible] onductor [illegible] r him to [illegible] play till [illegible] ing:

"For a moment it was all very perplexing. Some one suggested that the issue be dodged by referring to the city on the Neva as 'the Russian capital,' but some one else discovered that it isn't, since ancient Moscow has come into its own again. A counter-proposal was to leave it out of the programs altogether; but dear, dear! what would the erudite Mr. Philip Hale do when it came time to spell out in glib phrases the career of some new Russian creation which M Koussevitzky chose to produce before his public? No, the issue can not be dodged, and the old seat of the Czars must be mentioned in some way or other."

The Noetzel Studio

DAI BUELL

Dai Buell, to whom Philip Hale accredits "feminine elegance," achieved as sensational a triumph abroad as has been accorded an American artist in years.
This pianist is one of the host of internationally famous musicians who record their art for

THE AMPICO

Miss Buell's first recording, "Toccata" by Paradies, is a most impressive revelation of the personality capturing power of this incomparable, re-enacting piano. The spirited performance of this composition, so replete in rhythmic crystalline-colored charm, makes the hearer happier for having experienced it and Ampico owners have another gem awaiting them.
Other recordings by Miss Buell are in preparation and will soon be issued.

Chickering
ESTABLISHED 1823
169 Tremont Street, Boston
PIANOS OF ALL PRICES — EACH PRE-EMINENT IN ITS CLASS
4

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 8 - 1924

185

IN MUSICAL TROY.

Boston Symphony to Open Troy's Music Season Next Tuesday Night —Assisting Artists for Vocal Society's First Concert—Music Study Club to Present Interesting Program—Music in the Churches.

The Boston Symphony, which is to appear [illegible] Music Hall Tuesday evening at the initial concert of the Chromatic Club's season, has had many renowned conductors, but if the opinion of some of the world's greatest musicians and outstanding music critics can be used as a criterion, Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Symphony this season, is the most striking figure among conductors on both sides of the Atlantic. Koussevitsky is now in America for his first season and has come here direct from triumphs abroad. His earlier career in Russia was perhaps the most conspicuous in the now famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow, where he assembled his country's best musicians and drilled them into a remarkable organization. After Karl Muck's departure from this country during the war the question as to his successor was a serious problem to the Symphony management. Last season Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony. When the announcement was made of Koussevitsky's appointment to conduct the forces this season the Symphony management was overwhelmed with messages of congratulation. The Boston Symphony has long been hailed as the leading Symphony in this country, and the concert Tuesday night will undoubtedly prove the merit of this praise. Trojans are indeed fortunate that the Chromatic Club selected this renowned orchestra with its world-famed conductor to officially open the music season here.

The program follows:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, Bach C. P. E.
(Arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante lento moto
III. Allegro

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84, Beethoven

"Pictures at An Exhibition," Moussorgsky
(Arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel)

Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 38, Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico epassionate

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 8 - 1924

The first important musical event of the season in Troy will take place Tuesday evening when the Chromatic organization will bring to Music Hall the well known and much favored Boston Symphony Orchestra with the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. M. Koussevitsky has been called the world's greatest conductor and he comes to lead an orchestra that has grown into an honored institution in the musical circles of the country. The program that the orchestra and its brilliant leader will present includes the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor. This symphony was also given at the first concert of the season in Boston. The city papers in reviewing the concert said:

"A precedent was created at the first Boston Symphony concert last night when a composition had to be repeated owing to the insistent applause of the audience. This honor fell to the Brahms No. 4 in E minor. This new conductor does not treat his classics with fossilized reverence. He brings to them an inexhaustible freshness and vitality. He infused into Brahms an unceasing emotional and dramatic eloquence."

Since the opening concert in October, M. Kousevitsky has been calling forth the startled admiration of musical critics and the applause of those who appreciate symphony music led by the tremendous personality of a genius who combines an affection for modern music with a sympathy for and appreciation of the classics.

The program of the concert will be:

Bach, C. P. E.—Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximillian Steinberg.)
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Andante lento moto.
3. Allegro.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84.

Moussorgsky—Pictures at an Exhibition. (Arranged for Orchestra by M. Ravel.)

Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 38.
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Andante moderato.
3. Allegro giocoso.
4 Allegro energico epassionate.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

aper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 8 1924

Orchestra Program Talk.

Symphony orchestra patrons will be interested in the program talk to be given next Tuesday evening, at 8:30, on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The talk will be given in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with illustrations played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. There is no charge for admission, and all patrons of the concerts are welcome.

Bach Organ Recital.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH,
PA.
~~POST~~
NOV 8 1924

TO TELL OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A program talk will be given Tuesday night on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque.

traveler
Nov 8

Sixth Sympho[illegible] Concert Progra[illegible]

The next pair of Boston symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place on Nov. 21 and 22, since the coming week will be occupied by visits to Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

The coming Boston program will include: Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy's symphonic sketch, "The Sea"; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and Strauss's symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Literary Digest
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 8 1924

"LENINGRAD IN BOSTON"

MUSICAL BOSTON HAS BREWED a little tempest in her teapot over a geographical name. In the Boston Symphony Orchestra program-books appeared the word "Leningrad," and at once it was suspected that some subtle Bolshevist propaganda was being inspired by the new Russian leader, Koussevitzky. Forgetting that the word must be inscribed on any letter destined to reach the City of Peter the Great, the designation on the concert program looked like dangerous politics. Mr. Courtenay Guild, President of the Handel and Haydn Society and of the Apollo Club, sounded this protest to the Commercial Bulletin: "If we are pleased to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor." Deplorable as the change in name of the erstwhile Russian capital seems to the majority of the Boston papers, they are not in favor of sacrificing a musical genius to the whim of the party in power in present-day Russia, especially as Mr. Koussevitzky himself is said to lose no love to his radical compatriots. The Transcript traverses the case in a calm temper:

"Musical conductors, critics and program-makers are not, as a rule, fond of introducing politics, or even the shadow of politics, into their productions or their programs. Such a policy would jangle their sweet bells sadly out of tune. We can not imagine that the editors of a certain Symphony Hall program had any Bolshevistic intentions when they recently allowed the word 'Leningrad' to stand for the name of the city which was founded by Peter the Great and received from him—such was the founder's pious modesty—not his own name but that of the saint of the church after whom he was christened. When the successors of the great and pious Peter were overthrown, and a republican revolution bore sway in Russia, the name of the city was at once secularized, de-Germanized and made a greater honor still to its founder by being changed to Petrograd. This meant the city of Peter; and the capital took its place with Washington, Alexandria, and Constantinople as a commemoration of the great man who had made it a capital.

"But when the Soviet republic came in, the glory, as well as the prosperity, of the city of Peter departed. The capital was removed to Moscow in order to transport the center of government farther from European influence and sentiment, and bring it nearer to the breeding-place of the comparatively small knot of communists who had come to control the destinies of the country. Petrograd was left to freeze and rot. It was not, however, until the death of Lenin, the evil genius of revolutionary Russia, that the Soviet mind had compassed the monstrous conception of bestowing such a name as Leningrad, meaning the city of Lenin, upon the pride of modern Russia, the home of her greatness. But this idea was no sooner thought of than consummated. By Soviet ediet, Petrograd became Leningrad. It was an insult not only to the name and fame of Peter, but to the great Russian nation; it was an insult to Europe and to the world.

"The name is, however, now established in a manner as official as any that is possible in existing Russia. It is the name to which the long-suffering inhabitants of what was once St. Petersburg are compelled to submit. If formally we call the city by either of its old designations, we are calling it by a name that has ceased to exist officially. On the other hand, he who in any sort of document of the time uses the word 'Leningrad' merely falls in with the requirement of actuality and can not be accused of taking part in any Sovietish conspiracy. The disturbance over the use of the word in a musical program is a tempest in a teapot. In view of the keen and well-warranted aversion which the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, himself a Russian and a worthy and honored one, has to the use of the name, it would seem as if a point might have been strained and the word avoided. But the maker of this program probably never thought of that. We shall have to take an entirely routine sort of will for the deed.

"In the meantime, it is open to all of us to look forward with a sigh to the time when Russia shall return to her senses and to a respect for the historical proprieties; at which time the name of Lenin will assuredly be dropt from the city by the Neva, which is Russia's window toward Europe and America, and the name of Peter doubtless restored to it in some appropriate fashion. 'Leningrad' represents a national nightmare; it will pass—as the nightmare passed in France which might have rechristened Paris Robespierreville."

Courtesy of The Musical Courier (New York)

NOT A BOLSHEVIST

Though the word "Leningrad" creeping into a Boston Symphony program made Serge Koussevitzky a target of Boston's anti-Sovietism.

Quipsters could not be expected to lose such a chance as this situation affords; and so the Boston Herald tries to bring home the plight of the program-maker in this wise:

"If in the years to come the name of Washington, District of Columbia, should be changed by a wild-eyed government to Bryanville, the capital would then be known as Bryanville in all circles, foreign and domestic."

"F. P. A.," in the New York World, in a vein reminiscent of recent New York theatrical troubles, wonders if Mr. Guild "would like the Military Intelligence Division to censor the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra"; and finally settles back with this rumination:

"Possibly they want to make an American patriot of Conductor Koussevitzky. To placate Boston it may be necessary for him to say to his orchestra as he raps with his baton: 'Don't play till you see the whites of their eyes.'"

The Providence Journal shows the Boston teapot brewing:

"For a moment it was all very perplexing. Some one suggested that the issue be dodged by referring to the city on the Neva as 'the Russian capital,' but some one else discovered that it isn't, since ancient Moscow has come into its own again. A counter-proposal was to leave it out of the programs altogether; but dear, dear! what would the erudite Mr. Philip Hale do when it came time to spell out in glib phrases the career of some new Russian creation which M. Koussevitzky chose to produce before his public? No, the issue can not be dodged, and the old seat of the Czars must be mentioned in some way or other."

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 8 - 1924

IN MUSICAL TROY.

Boston Symphony to Open Troy's Music Season Next Tuesday Night—Assisting Artists for Vocal Society's First Concert—Music Study Club to Present Interesting Program—Music in the Churches.

The Boston Symphony, which is to appear at Music Hall Tuesday evening at the initial concert of the Chromatic Club's season, has had many renowned conductors, but if the opinion of some of the world's greatest musicians and outstanding music critics can be used as a criterion, Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Symphony this season, is the most striking figure among conductors on both sides of the Atlantic. Koussevitsky is now in America for his first season and has come here direct from triumphs abroad. His earlier career in Russia was perhaps the most conspicuous in the now famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow, where he assembled his country's best musicians and drilled them into a remarkable organization. After Karl Muck's departure from this country during the war the question as to his successor was a serious problem to the Symphony management. Last season Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony. When the announcement was made of Koussevitsky's appointment to conduct the forces this season the Symphony management was overwhelmed with messages of congratulation. The Boston Symphony has long been hailed as the leading Symphony in this country, and the concert Tuesday night will undoubtedly prove the merit of this praise. Trojans are indeed fortunate that the Chromatic Club selected this renowned orchestra with its world-famed conductor to officially open the music season here.

The program follows:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, Bach C. P E.
(Arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante lento moto
III. Allegro

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84, Beethoven

"Pictures at An Exhibition." Moussorgsky
(Arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel)

Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 38, Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico epassionate

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 8 - 1924

The first important musical event of the season in Troy will take place Tuesday evening when the Chromatic organization will bring to Music Hall the well known and much favored Boston Symphony Orchestra with the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. M. Koussevitsky has been called the world's greatest conductor and he comes to lead an orchestra that has grown into an honored institution in the musical circles of the country. The program that the orchestra and its brilliant leader will present includes the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor. This symphony was also given at the first concert of the season in Boston. The city papers in reviewing the concert said:

"A precedent was created at the first Boston Symphony concert last night when a composition had to be repeated owing to the insistent applause of the audience. This honor fell to the Brahms No. 4 in E minor. This new conductor does not treat his classics with fossilized reverence. He brings to them an inexhaustible freshness and vitality. He infused into Brahms an unceasing emotional and dramatic eloquence."

Since the opening concert in October, M. Kousevitsky has been calling forth the startled admiration of musical critics and the applause of those who appreciate symphony music led by the tremendous personality of a genius who combines an affection for modern music with a sympathy for and appreciation of the classics.

The program of the concert will be:

Bach. C. P. E.—Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Andante lento moto.
3. Allegro.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84.

Moussorgsky—Pictures at an Exhibition. (Arranged for Orchestra by M. Ravel.)

Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 38.
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Andante moderato.
3. Allegro giocoso.
4 Allegro energico epassionate.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 8 1924

Orchestra Program Talk.

Symphony orchestra patrons will be interested in the program talk to be given next Tuesday evening, at 8:30, on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The talk will be given in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with illustrations played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. There is no charge for admission, and all patrons of the concerts are welcome.

Bach Organ Recital.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST
NOV 8 1924

TO TELL OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A program talk will be given Tuesday night on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque.

Traveler
Nov 8

Sixth Symphony Concert Program

The next pair of Boston symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place on Nov. 21 and 22, since the coming week will be occupied by visits to Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

The coming Boston program will include: Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy's symphonic sketch, "The Sea"; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and Strauss's symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Literary Digest
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 8 1924

"LENINGRAD IN BOSTON"

MUSICAL BOSTON HAS BREWED a little tempest in her teapot over a geographical name. In the Boston Symphony Orchestra program-books appeared the word "Leningrad," and at once it was suspected that some subtle Bolshevist propaganda was being inspired by the new Russian leader, Koussevitzky. Forgetting that the word must be inscribed on any letter destined to reach the City of Peter the Great, the designation on the concert program looked like dangerous politics. Mr. Courtenay Guild, President of the Handel and Haydn Society and of the Apollo Club, sounded this protest to the Commercial Bulletin: "If we are pleased to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor." Deplorable as the change in name of the erstwhile Russian capital seems to the majority of the Boston papers, they are not in favor of sacrificing a musical genius to the whim of the party in power in present-day Russia, especially as Mr. Koussevitzky himself is said to lose no love to his radical compatriots. The Transcript traverses the case in a calm temper:

"Musical conductors, critics and program-makers are not, as a rule, fond of introducing politics, or even the shadow of politics, into their productions or their programs. Such a policy would jangle their sweet bells sadly out of tune. We can not imagine that the editors of a certain Symphony Hall program had any Bolshevistic intentions when they recently allowed the word 'Leningrad' to stand for the name of the city which was founded by Peter the Great and received from him—such was the founder's pious modesty—not his own name but that of the saint of the church after whom he was christened. When the successors of the great and pious Peter were overthrown, and a republican revolution bore sway in Russia, the name of the city was at once secularized, de-Germanized and made a greater honor still to its founder by being changed to Petrograd. This meant the city of Peter; and the capital took its place with Washington, Alexandria, and Constantinople as a commemoration of the great man who had made it a capital.

"But when the Soviet republic came in, the glory, as well as the prosperity, of the city of Peter departed. The capital was removed to Moscow in order to transport the center of government farther from European influence and sentiment, and bring it nearer to the breeding-place of the comparatively small knot of communists who had come to control the destinies of the country. Petrograd was left to freeze and rot. It was not, however, until the death of Lenin, the evil genius of revolutionary Russia, that the Soviet mind had compassed the monstrous conception of bestowing such a name as Leningrad, meaning the city of Lenin, upon the pride of modern Russia, the home of her greatness. But this idea was no sooner thought of than consummated. By Soviet edict, Petrograd became Leningrad. It was an insult not only to the name and fame of Peter, but to the great Russian nation; it was an insult to Europe and to the world.

"The name is, however, now established in a manner as official as any that is possible in existing Russia. It is the name to which the long-suffering inhabitants of what was once St. Petersburg are compelled to submit. If formally we call the city by either of its old designations, we are calling it by a name that has ceased to exist officially. On the other hand, he who in any sort of document of the time uses the word 'Leningrad' merely falls in with the requirement of actuality and can not be accused of taking part in any Sovietish conspiracy. The disturbance over the use of the word in a musical program is a tempest in a teapot. In view of the keen and well-warranted aversion which the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, himself a Russian and a worthy and honored one, has to the use of the name, it would seem as if a point might have been strained and the word avoided. But the maker of this program probably never thought of that. We shall have to take an entirely routine sort of will for the deed.

"In the meantime, it is open to all of us to look forward with a sigh to the time when Russia shall return to her senses and to a respect for the historical proprieties; at which time the name of Lenin will assuredly be dropt from the city by the Neva, which is Russia's window toward Europe and America, and the name of Peter doubtless restored to it in some appropriate fashion. 'Leningrad' represents a national nightmare; it will pass—as the nightmare passed in France which might have re-christened Paris Robespierreville."

Courtesy of The Musical Courier (New York)

NOT A BOLSHEVIST

Though the word "Leningrad" creeping into a Boston Symphony program made Serge Koussevitzky a target of Boston's anti-Sovietism.

Quipsters could not be expected to lose such a chance as this situation affords; and so the Boston Herald tries to bring home the plight of the program-maker in this wise:

"If in the years to come the name of Washington, District of Columbia, should be changed by a wild-eyed government to Bryanville, the capital would then be known as Bryanville in all circles, foreign and domestic."

"F. P. A.," in the New York World, in a vein reminiscent of recent New York theatrical troubles, wonders if Mr. Guild "would like the Military Intelligence Division to censor the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra"; and finally settles back with this rumination:

"Possibly they want to make an American patriot of Conductor Koussevitzky. To placate Boston it may be necessary for him to say to his orchestra as he raps with his baton: 'Don't play till you see the whites of their eyes.'"

The Providence Journal shows the Boston teapot brewing:

"For a moment it was all very perplexing. Some one suggested that the issue be dodged by referring to the city on the Neva as 'the Russian capital,' but some one else discovered that it isn't, since ancient Moscow has come into its own again. A counter-proposal was to leave it out of the programs altogether; but dear, dear! what would the erudite Mr. Philip Hale do when it came time to spell out in glib phrases the career of some new Russian creation which Mr. Koussevitzky chose to produce before his public? No, the issue can not be dodged, and the old seat of the Czars must be mentioned in some way or other."

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 8 - 1924

IN MUSICAL TROY.

Boston Symphony to Open Troy's Music Season Next Tuesday Night—Assisting Artists for Vocal Society's First Concert—Music Study Club to Present Interesting Program—Music in the Churches.

The Boston Symphony, which is to appear at Music Hall Tuesday evening at the initial concert of the Chromatic Club's season, has had many renowned conductors, but if the opinion of some of the world's greatest musicians and outstanding music critics can be used as a criterion, Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Symphony this season, is the most striking figure among conductors on both sides of the Atlantic. Koussevitsky is now in America for his first season and has come here direct from triumphs abroad. His earlier career in Russia was perhaps the most conspicuous in the now famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow, where he assembled his country's best musicians and drilled them into a remarkable organization. After Karl Muck's departure from this country during the war the question as to his successor was a serious problem to the Symphony management. Last season Pierre Monteux conducted the symphony. When the announcement was made of Koussevitsky's appointment to conduct the forces this season the Symphony management was overwhelmed with messages of congratulation. The Boston Symphony has long been hailed as the leading Symphony in this country, and the concert Tuesday night will undoubtedly prove the merit of this praise. Trojans are indeed fortunate that the Chromatic Club selected this renowned orchestra with its world-famed conductor to officially open the music season here.

The program follows:

Concerto for Orchestra in D Major, Bach C. P E.
(Arranged by Maxmilian Steinberg)
I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante lento moto
III. Allegro

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84, Beethoven

"Pictures at An Exhibition," Moussorgsky
(Arranged for orchestra by M. Ravel)

Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 38, Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante moderato
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico epassionate

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 8 - 1924

The first important musical event of the season in Troy will take place Tuesday evening when the Chromatic organization will bring to Music Hall the well known and much favored Boston Symphony Orchestra with the new Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. M. Koussevitsky has been called the world's greatest conductor and he comes to lead an orchestra that has grown into an honored institution in the musical circles of the country. The program that the orchestra and its brilliant leader will present includes the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor. This symphony was also given at the first concert of the season in Boston. The city papers in reviewing the concert said:

"A precedent was created at the first Boston Symphony concert last night when a composition had to be repeated owing to the insistent applause of the audience. This honor fell to the Brahms No. 4 in E minor. This new conductor does not treat his classics with fossilized reverence. He brings to them an inexhaustible freshness and vitality. He infused into Brahms an unceasing emotional and dramatic eloquence."

Since the opening concert in October, M. Kousevitsky has been calling forth the startled admiration of musical critics and the applause of those who appreciate symphony music led by the tremendous personality of a genius who combines an affection for modern music with a sympathy for and appreciation of the classics.

The program of the concert will be:

Bach. C. P. E.—Concerto for Orchestra in D major (Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
1. Allegro moderato.
2. Andante lento moto.
3. Allegro.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84.

Moussorgsky—Pictures at an Exhibition. (Arranged for Orchestra by M. Ravel.)

Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 38.
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Andante moderato.
3. Allegro giocoso.
4 Allegro energico epassionate.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 8 1924

Orchestra Program Talk.

Symphony orchestra patrons will be interested in the program talk to be given next Tuesday evening, at 8:30, on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The talk will be given in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with illustrations played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. There is no charge for admission, and all patrons of the concerts are welcome.

Bach Organ Recital.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
NOV 8 1924

TO TELL OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

A program talk will be given Tuesday night on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque.

Theatre
Nov 8

Sixth Symphon.. Concert Progra..

The next pair of Boston symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place on Nov. 21 and 22, since the coming week will be occupied by visits to Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

The coming Boston program will include: Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy's symphonic sketch, "The Sea"; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and Strauss's symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

186

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION

NOV 8 - 1924

...n Symphony Orchestra.

Pronounced interest has been evident ever since the first announcement of the coming concert of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 men at the State Armory Monday night, with the great Serge Koussevitzky making his first appearance here as conductor of the organization. And now the interest is at its height and the event is anticipated with remarkable interest and enthusiasm. It will be a red letter occasion in Schenectady. The audience will contain many enthusiasts from out of town, for Albany will send over 100 for attendance; Glens Falls will send one delegation of 25, and Canajoharie will send 20 in one party. Amsterdam, Gloversville, Johnstown, Ballston Spa and Saratoga Springs will be largely represented, and it must not be forgotten that 300 students of the public schools of the city will be there to enjoy the event. The seat sales at the stores of the Barney Company, the Wallace Company, and Cluett and Sons show the certain interest in the concert, and the program to be presented is designed to interest every one in the big assemblage. It will be presented as follows:

I

Concerto for Orchestra in D major, Arr. by Steinberg.....C. P. A. Bach
Allegro moderato
Andante lento moto
Allegro

II

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

III

a. "Vocalize" Arr. by composer for Orchestra ..... Rachmaninov
b. "Dubinouchka" (Folk Song) .....Rimsky-Korsakov
c. Prelude to Opera, "Khovantchina .....Moussorgsky
d. "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" Scherzo from opera, "Tsar Saltan" .....Rimsky-Korsakov

IV

Symphony in C minor, No. 5 .....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro; Trio
Allegro

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 8 192
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

Boston Symphony At Schenectady, Nov. 10

On account of the fact that Albany has no large auditorium available for concerts that draw immense audiences, the city has just lost one great treat in the appearance of Geraldine Farrar in "Carmen," that took place at Schenectady, October 10th, and now Ben Franklin announces his second attraction at Schenectady, where he will present the great Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 artists in the State armory, Monday evening, November 10th. In this event the orchestra will be lead by Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, and who is said to be one of the greatest leaders of the age. Critics unite in saying great things of his ability, and some go so far as to claim that before the year is over he will be acclaimed as the greatest of all conductors. This is what the Boston Transcript said of his first appearance in Boston on October 10th:

"Conductor, orchestra and audience regarded every tradition; fulfilled every rite. On the tick of two-thirty yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky emerged upon the stage of Symphony hall; while the shade of Henry Higginson, no doubt watching from the Celestial hills, blessed him for his punctuality. As the new conductor crossed to his stand the whole house arose to salute and applaud him. Making the distinction of a musician who cherishes his instrument, he acknowledged first the greeting of the band—with a collective handshake bestowed individually upon Mr. Burgin, the concert master. Next Mr. Koussevitzky turned to his audience, gracefully acknowledging his reception, and then at once turned to the score of his first piece.

As a conductor Mr. Koussevitzky shows few traces of the mannerisms that have won for other conductors the nick-name of "prima donna of the baton." Koussevitzky's features are always definite commands promptly obeyed by his orchestra. He has no difficulty in securing vivid pianissimo and ortissimo effects. The man who can conduct as did Koussevitzky yesterday is a genius and he left no doubt with the great audience in regard to his complete mastery, indeed he left them with the positive understanding that he is one of the greatest conductors before the public today, perhaps the greatest."

Orders for tickets for the Schenectady concert may be sent to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, Albany, and he will give them his personal attention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD

NOV 8 - 1924

Society Announces First Concert.

The Boston String Quartet which will appear with the Troy Vocal Society at Music Hall on November 19, the occasion of the first concert of the Jubilee Season, enjoys the unique position of having had over two years of constant rehearsals before announcing its programs. The founder of the quartet, Harrison Keller, first violin, received his first instruction from Theodore Lindburg. In Berlin, he studied with Gustav Hollaender, violin; Wilhelm Klatte, composition, and Alexander Fiederman, violin. The outbreak of the world war found him in Petrograd as a pupil of Leopold Auer. Albert Shepherd, second violin, was for several years concert-master of the Salt Lake City Symphony Orchestra. Hans Werner has been leading viola player in several of the best known symphony orchestras here and abroad. He is now a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. George Miquelle, violoncello, was acclaimed at Paris first as a "child wonder" and later as a remarkable artist-pupil of the Lille and Paris Conservatoires. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1918 and 1920. The past two seasons he toured the United States and Canada as soloist, with gratifying success.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
JOURNAL

NOV 8 1924

FINE CONCERT ASSURED

Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra to be Played in Schenectady

Albanians in goodly number will journey to Schenectady Monday night in order to attend the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 men, under the superb conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, who on this occasion will make his first appearance in this territory. The importance of the event justifies the journey to Schenectady, for it will be one of the most interesting and enjoyable musical occasions ever given in the Albany radius. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin of this city, and phone orders for tickets to him at 18 Chestnut street will receive personal attention. The Schenectady seat sales are at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Barney company, and the Wallace company. Cars of the Schenectady railway company pass the door of the armory. This is the program:

I

Concerto for orchestra in D major, arr. by Steinberg ....C. P. A. Bach
Allegro Moderato.
Andante lento moto.
Allegro.

II

Overture to "Oberon" .....Weber

III

(a) "Vocalize," arr. by composer for orchestra ..... Rachmaninov
(b) "Dubinouchka" (Folk Song) ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
(c) Prelude to opera, "Khovantchina" ..... Moussorgsky
(d) "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, from opera, "Tsar Saltan" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

IV

Symphony in C minor, No. 5..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio.
Andante Con Moto.
Allegro; Trio.
Allegro.

Boston Post
Nov 8 '24

SYMPHONY BARES GEM OF MOZART

New Beauties Are Disclosed by Koussevitzky's Reading

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

No torrents of musical emotion were released at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon; no Fifth Symphony, "Tannhauser" Bacchanale or Siegfriedian Funeral Music stood upon the programme.

Yet it was a concert that brought keen enjoyment; one long to be treasured in the recollection, and one that throughout its course provoked marked enthusiasm.

AFFECTIONATE WITH MOZART

Yesterday for the first time in Boston Mr. Koussevitzky was heard as interpreter of Mozart and of Debussy: in the one instance through the G minor Symphony and in the other through two of the Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." And to the supreme classicist and to the supreme impressionist alike the conductor brought that divining imagination, that enkindling ardor with which already he had newly revealed to us the music of Beethoven and Brahms, of Weber and Wagner.

In the knowledge of Mr. Koussevitzky's temperament and practices some might perhaps have found it not wholly surprising had he read into the G minor Symphony a feverishness and an intensity not customarily associated with it. But clearly he is too well poised a musician thus to confuse classicism and romanticism. A tornadic Beethoven is easily conceivable; a neurotic Mozart would be hard to justify.

A Satisfactory Performance

In Mr. Koussevitzky's version of this loveliest of symphonies there is no straining after effect, no false emotionalizing; gentle Mozartian melancholy is not transmuted into Tchaikovskian morbidity. Rather was the G minor given a performance exquisitely proportioned, rarely euphonious and subtly rhythmed. Inner voices hitherto often overlooked were brought to the fore, yet clearly in fidelity to the composer's intentions, not in variance with them. All in all a performance of the Symphony that refreshed the ear, gladdened the heart and satisfied the mind.

Never before, it can now be said, has Boston harbored a conductor so sensitive, so responsive to the music of Debussy as yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky proved himself to be.

Debussy as Should Be

For once "Clouds" had the impalpable quality of Debussy's imaginings. For once in "Festivals" might be heard, or rather felt, "the luminous dust participating in the universal rhythm of all things," while the episode of the procession was, again to use the composer's own words, "a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision." Scant wonder that at the end of the Nocturnes, as at the conclusion of the Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky was fervently applauded. And again, as so many times before, he paid his own graceful acknowledgement to the eloquence and the virtuosity of the orchestra.

To begin this concert came a performance of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," in which Mr. Koussevitzky did for that somewhat overrated composition all that any composer might legitimately do; at its end came the music that for many was no doubt the most delectable portion of the whole, Ravel's orchestral transcription of Musorgsky's piano-pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition," heard for the first time in America.

Boston Herald
Nov 8

FIFTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Playing of De Bussy Nocturnes Striking Feature of Program

MOUSSORGSKY'S "PICTURES" ALSO

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont," Mozart, Symphony, G minor; Debussy, nocturnes; "Nuegaes" and "Fetes"; Moussorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Ravel (first time in America).

Some, remembering how Mr. Koussevitzky read the cantabile theme in the main body of the overture to "Oberon" and insisting that it was sung with too much sentiment, shook their heads when they saw in the program book that he would perform the overture to "Egmont" and the G minor symphony of Mozart. What would he not do to them! Probably one or two exclaimed: "New wine in old bottles," or indulged themselves in similar platitudes.

They were grieviously disappointed yesterday, for the classic works were performed without any attempt at modernization. True, there was here and there in the symphony a slight slackening of pace before the introduction of a new musical idea, but this slackening was natural, not forced, serving as a graceful one might say Mozartian preparation.

The performance of the overture was uncommonly dramatic. We heard this overture played in Berlin by the Philharmonic orchestra in the early eighties. When Franz Wuelner, the conductor, came to the heavy recurring chords in the Allegro, the chords that are supposed by some ingenious, deep-thinking commentators to typify the lean-visaged Duke of Alva with his iron heel of oppression, he played them Adazio with long holds and a long pause between them, thinking thus to give them emphasis. The continuity of the Allegro was thus destroyed; the musical energy instead of being strenghtened was dissipated; Beethoven's fire was for the moment quenched.

The performance of the symphony was conspicuous for its clearness, its happy choice of tempi, its euphony. Measures in dialogue were musically as well as rhetorically contrasted. The second movement was sung with great but not exaggerated expression, and for once it was not dragged. Did some think the Finale was taken too fast? Mozart indicated a very rapid pace, but as played yesterday there was distinctness: the instruments had time to breathe: no detail was slighted. In fact the clarity of the whole performance led one again to wonder at the structure and the beauty of this masterwork among symphonies, ancient or modern.

Interesting as Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures" is, the most striking feature of the concert was the extraordinary performance of the two Nocturnes. Mr. Koussevitzky has succeeded in obtaining an orchestral pianissimo — as yesterday in "Nuages" — that is sustained, not merely for a measure or two after which there is the tonal restlessness that shows the impatience of the players to swell the tone—yet not an "inaudible pianissimo." And so yesterday the "Nuages" was approximately vaporous, elusive, now floating, now arrested, dreamy music, musical cloudland. The hearer for the first time fully appreciating the exquisite character of the Nocturne remembered the famous prose-poem of Baudelaire. Then followed a gorgeous reading of "Fetes," one of Debussy's crowning works. How skilfully Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the episode of the pompous, superb procession, sounding its spectacular way at first as from far off!

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," composed for the piano, were a tribute to his dead friend Hartmann, the architect, whose drawings and pictures were shown publicly after his death. (Harold Bauer played the series here some years ago). They have been orchestrated by four musicians. Ravel's version was made for Mr. Koussevitzky. It was a labor of love, for his work shows uncommon fancy, humor and technical skill. He has glorified Moussorgsky's little pieces. Ravel's wit,

Boston Globe
Nov 8

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ravel's Arrangement From Musorgsky Pleases

Koussevitzky put at the end of yesterday's Symphony concert a piece which no other conductor is legally entitled to perform, Ravel's arrangement for orchestra, made at his request, of Musorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." The copyright to the Musorgsky belongs to a firm of publishers who granted permission for Ravel's arrangement to be made only upon condition that nobody but the present leader of the Boston Symphony should conduct it in public.

Musorgsky's music was suggested to him by pictures he saw at an actual exhibit in Moscow in 1874 of the work of an artist then lately dead who had been one of his intimates. The subjects depicted range from "Chickens in Their Shells" to "The Catacombs," or, if you prefer, from a Polish oxcart to a mediaeval castle with a troubadour out in front serenading the inmates.

Musorgsky's almost unique gift for suggesting visual images, a gift of which the opera "Boris Godunov," the "Six Enfantines," for solo voice, and many another work of his already heard here have afforded ample evidence is so successfully displayed in these tone pictures as almost to convert a sceptic to belief in program music.

Ravel's superlative cleverness as a musical craftsman is beautifully illustrated in his arrangement. One felt that for once an arranger had done all that the composer would have wished, and more. The mordant quality in Musorgsky's musical jokes has fascinated him. Only the Russian naivete in some of the humor eludes his sympathy, if one may judge by so vague a test as the coloring he gives some passages in the orchestration. The interpretation by Koussevitzky yesterday was superb, another proof of his genius as a conductor.

The Mozart G minor symphony was given the least satisfactory performance any number has yet received at Koussevitzky's hands here. His version of the minuet is by far the best imagined one remembers. He thinks of it as a minuet, where Teutonic conductors always seem obsessed by the irrelevant historic fact that out of symphonic minuets eventually evolved symphonic scherzos.

But the first movement and the andante, both among the finest things ever composed by Mozart, or by anybody, were sandpapered rather carelessly to a smooth, but dulled, surface. His idea of adding interest and building climaxes in these two movements seemed to be to alter the tempo suddenly and to pile on meaningless stresses.

Mozart, more than any other composer, must be played with infinite subtlety of nuance and perfect clarity of outline. His music is not and can not be made exciting. This is not said in its dispraise. Heaven, so we are told, is not exciting either.

If Koussevitzky would only realize that Mozart demands just the qualities of the interpreter which Debussy demands and which the two nocturnes played yesterday received in full measure his Mozart conducting would improve. Debussy, too, wrote with serious elegance of style, perfect clarity of formal structure, and an avoidance of meaningless violence and tumult that is essentially aristocratic in the best sense of the term.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, dramatically played, is obviously not hackneyed to Koussevitzky, and, therefore thrills instead of boring the audience as it has of late years from other hands.

There are no Symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra is visiting Buffalo, Pittsburg and way stations. Its first New York concert does not come until Nov 27, however. P. H.

Advertiser
Nov 8

CHICKEN BALLET DELIGHTS SYMPHONY MATINEE CROWD

CHICKEN ballet, Impressionistic Debussy tone pictures, a brilliant Mozart symphony, Beethoven's intensely dramatic "Egmont" overture—these features of the fifth Symphony program offer enough variety to meet any reasonable demand.

The chicken ballet comes in Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a series of sketches written originally for piano. The Ravel arrangement was made last year in Paris for Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducted it for the first time in this country at yesterday's Symphony concert. It is a delightful bit of humorous fancy and was exquisitely played. The audience laughed and applauded.

There are 10 sketches altogether in the Moussorgsky-Ravel number. The gnome, medieval troubadour and flying witches scenes are especially imaginative. There is also a comic wrangle between two Polish Jews.

Koussevitzky proved anew that Debussy music is not necessarily fragile or anaemic. He gave a rousing reading of "Fetes," one of the two "Nocturnes." "Clouds" remains as it should be, a pale pastel.

Mozart's brilliant G minor symphony was performed in a manner that recalled the splendid gayety that marked old Vienna.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 8 1924

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING HERE SOON

The program is announced for the debut here of Serge Koussevitszky as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of the Symphony season here in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Nov. 18. The soloist will be Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto. Since the singer has just arrived in America, her numbers are not yet decided. The symphonic portion of the program will include: Berlioz's "Roman Carnival overture;" Honegger's "Pacific 231;" Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Bumble Bee" Scherzo, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. When the little Scherzo of the Russian composer was performed in Boston, the audience demanded and effected a repetition, thus breaking an age-long rule of the Symphony concerts. Honegger's description of a modern American locomotive in action has been introduced to America by the new conductor and has created a very considerable interest all over the country. The sale of season tickets will close next Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 9 1924

Orchestra Program Talk.

Charles N. Boyd will give a program talk Tuesday evening in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute on the Boston Symphony Orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the Symphony season next Friday night in Syria Mosque.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
NOV 9 1924 187

TALK ON SYMPHONY

Symphony orchestra patrons will be interested in the program talk to be given next Tuesday evening, November 11, on the Boston symphony orchestra numbers to be presented at the opening of the symphony season next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 14 and 15, at Syria Mosque.

The talk next Tuesday night will be given in the recital room of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with illustrations played on two pianos by Dallmeyer Russel and William H. Oetting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 8 1924

Society Announces First Concert.

The Boston String Quartet which will appear with the Troy Vocal Society at Music Hall on November 19, the occasion of the first concert of the Jubilee Season, enjoys the unique position of having had over two years of constant rehearsals before announcing its programs. The founder of the quartet, Harrison Keller, first violin, received his first instruction from Theodore Lindburg. In Berlin, he studied with Gustav Hollaender, violin; Wilhelm Klatte, composition, and Alexander Fiederman, violin. The outbreak of the world war found him in Petrograd as a pupil of Leopold Auer. Albert Shepherd, second violin, was for several years concert-master of the Salt Lake City Symphony Orchestra. Hans Werner has been leading viola player in several of the best known symphony orchestras here and abroad. He is now a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. George Miquelle, violoncello, was acclaimed in Paris first as a "child wonder" and later as a remarkable artist-pupil of the Lille and Paris Conservatoires. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1918 and 1920. The past two seasons he toured the United States and Canada as soloist, with gratifying success.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SCHENECTADY N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 8 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 instrumentalists, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who on this occasion makes his first appearance in this city, will take place Monday night at 8:30 o'clock in the armory, and under the management of Ben Franklin. Ever since this event was first announced, the interest has been on the increase and now it is at its height among the music lovers of the territory. That Koussevitzky and his great orchestra will be greeted by an immense audience is certain, and the event is expected to mark an epoch in the musical history of the city. The big audience will contain 300 students of the public schools, a delegation of 25 from Glens Falls and another of 20 from Canajoharie. There will be over 100 Albanians in attendance and Amsterdam, Gloversville, Johnstown, Ballston Spa and Saratoga Springs will send delegations. The program of the concert contains works of the famous masters of the past and present, and is designed to interest every one in attendance. It will be presented as follows:

I.
Concerto for orchestra in D major, arranged by Steinberg C. P. A. Bach
Allegro moderato
Andante lento moto
Allegro

II.
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

III.
"Vocalize," arranged by composer for orchestra ..... Rachmaninov
"Dubinouchka" (Folk Song) .....
..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude to opera, "Khovantchina" ...
..... Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from opera, "Tsar Saltan" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

IV.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....
..... Beethoven
Allegro con brie
Andante con moto
Allegro: Trio
Allegro.

The seat sales at Cluett and Sons, the Barney Company and the Wallace Company show the great interest in the occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 9 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy on Nov. 28, is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America. Scores introduced to Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky included: "Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite"; Albert Russel's Symphony, Op. 23, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel.

Nov 9

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week. The orchestra is going not to New York city but to Buffalo and Pittsburg. Koussevitzky's New York debut comes Thanksgiving night. The seat sale for the New York concerts have been larger than for several seasons past, but seats are still to be Nearly every seat for these Monday Symphony concerts is already sold for the season in advance of the public sale. At last accounts a few tickets at $7.50 and $9 for the series were still to be had. A very few seats, less than 30, are or lately were unsold for the Saturday night regular series. The Friday seats are all sold for the season since last April, except for the 505 rush seats in the second balcony, to which admission is 50 cents. For the Sanders Theatre concerts in Cambridge, a series of nine, there are the rush seats in the balcony over the stage and at last accounts a very few season tickets. It is obvious that those who did not subscribe to any series of Boston Symphony concerts have almost no chance to hear the orchestra in a series of performances as brilliant as any ever given anywhere. The few single tickets on sale are always sold out far in advance for each and every concert.

The success of the new conductor, Koussevitsky, with both reviewers and public, has been almost [illegible]. From his [illegible] writer has been able to gather not a single adverse criticism of Koussevitsky. The reservations made by the musical reviewers about his tempi and his disregard of conventions are not made by most of the public of the concerts. There are some who still think there is a bit too much modern music played, but they are the people to whom De[illegible] are still dangerous.

The Boston Symphony program for the next concerts, Nov 21 and 22, includes Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; a symphony in C by Boccherini, a composer chiefly remembered nowadays on the strength of a single celebrated minuet and some pieces for cello; Debussy's "La mer"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." There is no soloist. Would that there were never going to be any soloists at these concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music Hall, next Thursday evening, November 13th under the local management of Bessie Bellanca is one which should provide ample scope for the play of Serge Koussevitzky's volcanic temperament. In the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, a C. P. E. Bach Concerto and the works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky and other Russian composers, the controlled fire of the new Russian conductor's personality should find its fullest opportunity for expression. There has been so much discussion of Koussevitzky's nervous intensity, it is interesting to read Ernest Newman's comment in a recent issue of the American Mercury.

The great English music critic says: "America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him as they do about every conductor. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

"Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying, a propos of 'Tristan,' 'Believe me, the brain that could pour out the passionate music must have been cold as ice.' What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that directs the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master."

One of the Russian works included in the program, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is a charming Scherzo from the composer's fairy opera "Tsar Sultan." When this piece was performed in Boston recently, Koussevitzky was forced by persistant applause to grant an encore, the first time the Boston Symphony had given an encore in 40 years.

The program reads:

Bach, C. P. E.—Concerto for orchestra in D major.
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg)
Allegro moderato.
Andante lento moto.
Allegro.
Weber—Overture to ..... "Oberon"
Rachmaninov ..... "Vocalize"
(Arranged for orchestra by the composer)
Rimsky-Korsakov ..... "Dubinouchka"
(Russian folk song)
Moussorgsky—Prelude to the opera.. ..... "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov .....
..... "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"
Scherzo from the Opera "Tsar Saltan"
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor, op. 67.
Allegro con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; trio.
Allegro.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware Avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT
NOV 9 1924

Pacific 231.

Yes, it is meant to typify a western railroad lomotive—Pacific 261. And the strange part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Groupe des Six—numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Sefge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony introduced Pacific 231 to the world—on May 8th last, in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

Pacific 231 cannot be classed with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element, and since Honegger (a Swiss, born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to depict through the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace over the rails. It is freak music which will subside as the power does from a "dead" engine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
NOV 9 1924

Pacific 231.

YES, it is meant to typify a westren railroad locomotive—Pacific 231. And the strange part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Groupe des Six . . . numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony introduced Pacific 231 to the world . . . on May 8 last in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

Pacific 231 cannot be classified with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element, and since Honegger (a Swiss, born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to depict through the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace which will subside as the power does from a "dead" engine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 9 1924

Nearly every seat for these Monday Symphony concerts is already sold for the season in advance of the public sale. At last accounts a few tickets at $7.50 and $9 for the series were still to be had. A very few seats, less than 30, are or lately were unsold for the Saturday night regular series. The Friday seats are all sold for the season since last April, except for the 505 rush seats in the second balcony, to which admission is 50 cents. For the Sanders Theatre concerts in Cambridge, a series of nine, there are the rush seats in the balcony over the stage and at last accounts a very few season tickets. It is obvious that those who did not subscribe to any series of Boston Symphony concerts have almost no chance to hear the orchestra in a series of performances as brilliant as any ever given anywhere. The few single tickets on sale are always sold out far in advance for each and every concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
NOV 9 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Russian scores will be featured at each of the coming concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Syria Mosque on Friday evening, November 14, and Saturday afternoon, November 15. At the Friday concert there will be played Moussorgsky's piano suite. Pictures at an exhibition, as arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, French composer. The pictures include "Gnomus," "The Old Castle," "Tuileries," "Bydlo" (a Polish ox cart), "Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells," "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyl," "Catacombs," "The Hut on Fowls' Legs," "The Great Gate of Kiev."

At the Saturday afternoon concert there will be played Arensky's variations on a theme of Tschaikovsky; the prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee."

Arensky chose for his variations a theme of a beautiful melody from a collection of children's songs, and added to its charm by his various uses of it. They are written for the string orchestra, and enlarged from a string quartet.

The two great monuments of Moussorgsky's genius are his operas, "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina." The prelude to the latter depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is a little scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan," in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes.

188

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 9 1924

The Language of Opera—Encores in Symphony Hall

By OLIN DOWNES.

It has fallen to the Chicago Symphony Orchestra to introduce a new and evidently important work of Charles Martin Loeffler to the American public. Ordinarily such records have pertained to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which, in years gone by and before he had reached his present eminence as a composer, Mr. Loeffler was a member. His new score is the symphonic poem, "Memories of My Childhood." In it Mr. Loeffler looks far back and away from Medfield, Mass., to the Russian village of Smiela in the Government of Kieff, where he spent some of the most impressionable years of his boyhood, and where he heard "Russian peasant songs, the Yourod's Litany—prayer, fairy tales and dance songs. The closing movement of the symphonic poem commemorates the death of Vasinka, an elderly peasant, Bayan or storyteller, singer, maker of willow pipes upon which he played tunes of weird intervals, and the companion and friend of the boy who now, later in life, notes down what he hopes these pages will tell."

The symphonic poem opens with chiming of distant church bells, followed by a fragment of the Russian Litany, "God Have Mercy Upon Us"; then by the folk-melody of a "Fairy Tale"; the strains of a Dance, the theme of which is sustained by four harmonicas; elegiac measures for the death of the peasant and childhood friend, Vasinka, and music of a sunnier and consolatory mood which brings the conclusion.

Here is a novelty, according to Felix Borowski, who writes of the Chicago performance, of uncommon interest and character. It should attract New York makers of orchestral programs—or will Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony oblige?

***

Mr. Koussevitzky broke the ancient and excellent tradition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opposed "encores" by the band, when he repeated the brief and evidently "catchy" little piece of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Bee," at a recent concert in Symphony Hall. It is related that once, years ago, Dr. Karl Muck nearly did the same thing with Chabrier's "España"—that he raised his baton to do this, but on second thought desisted. It is to be hoped that neither Mr. Koussevitzky nor other orchestral conductors will be encouraged in any such procedure. The arrangement of a program of symphonic music is an important and a delicate matter. The time taken by each composition, the order in which the various dishes of the musical menu should appear, often present very perplexing problems to the conductor, as any one who has led or tried to arrange the programs of a series of symphony concerts knows. The fortunes of a new composition often hang on the audience's impressions of the works which precede or follow it—or both. Even the greatest care on the part of the arranger cannot prevent occasional misfits, which are likely to influence public and reviewers. Every one who follows concerts has been present on occasions when one good composition killed or maimed another work of merit, and this only because the conductor involuntarily did the thing that is frequently done at picture exhibitions—hanging the picture in the wrong light.

There is a far better way of repeating music on a symphony program. It has been now and again followed by conductors, especially by Mr. Koussevitzky in his concerts of modern music in Paris. It consists not in the impulsive repetition of a work which has happened to hit the popular fancy (and the works which do hit the popular fancy at an initial hearing are frequently not works of importance or lasting value), but in duly arranging and announcing its repetition on the program, in the place the conductor thinks best, and with attention of the audience prepared for the second performance. This is a practice particularly desirable with new or little-known music which is a bone of contention. At two of the Koussevitzky concerts last Summer that we personally remember the new piano concerto of Stravinsky and the work for chorus and orchestra, "Sept, ils sont sept," of Prokofieff, were repeated, with excellent results for audience and composer. This is a constructive practice, especially with music of radical characteristics, but the encore habit is certainly not desirable at orchestral concerts, be it with a trifle of the "Bee" type or a movement of suite or symphony. There is a large and very rich orchestral literature. It has to be presented with the utmost care for proportion and sequence. Furthermore, the American public does not favor a symphony program that lasts over an hour and three-quarters in length. In that time conductors who are properly curious and appreciative of all that is interesting in symphonic literature usually find that they have little enough opportunity to do justice to the scores they wish to present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 9 1924

The symphonic movement, "Pacific 231," was first performed a the Koussevitsky concert in Paris May 8, 1924, at which time the composer offered the following explanatory comment on his work: "I have always passionately loved locomotives. To me they are loving creatures, and I love them as others love women and horses. What I wanted to express in the 'Pacific' is not the noise of an engine, but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it." Andre George, in the Revue Musical (Paris, June 1, 1924), says: "This passionate love he translates in the most magnificent language. He chooses as his heroine the locomotive of the Pacific type, No. 231, for heavy trains of high speed. At first there is a hissing of harmonies in the violins while the monster is still at rest; then the effort of getting under way necessitates heavy passages in the double basses; acceleration brings into play the entire orchestral mass to culminate in the lyric state, the pathos of the 300-tone train hurtling through the night at a speed of 70 miles an hour. This lyric joy is clamored by horns and trombones over the prodigious violence of the strings; after which dynamic force is subdued by powerful brakes, and the train arrives in broad and sumptuous chords." The work is scored for piccolo, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, English horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, double bassoon, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, gong and strings. The first American performance was given under Koussevitsky at Boston, October 10, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first New York performance by Damrosch on October 31.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 9 1924

Programme Announced for Debut Here of Serge Koussevitzky with Boston Symphony Nov. 18.—Torpadie-De Stefano Recital Wednesday.—Events of Week.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Honegger's "Pacific 231" as a novelty on their opening programme at Infantry Hall a week from this Tuesday. This piece by the Parisian composer describing a modern American locomotive in action, was introduced to America by the Symphony's new conductor at his debut in Boston. It was looked forward to with eager expectancy and proved, according to the critics, a striking piece of music. The audience was amazed and liked it exceedingly.

The composer's attempt has been, as H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript says, to reproduce the visual images and sensations evoked in him by locomotives of the largest, heaviest, speediest type in common use upon both European and American railways.

"Such psychological processes are not uncommon," he says. "There is even a scientific name for them: 'Iconographic Hearing.' In fact, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, the learned secretary to Mr. Koussevitzky, came upon an essay about them in an Italian review. 'It stated,' he writes, 'that certain people associate musical melodies or phrases with determined visual images of architectural character, as others associate sounds or tonalities with certain colors—associations which have been developed to a very high degree by Skriabin and Rimsky-Korsakov.

"The 'Pacific' of Honegger represents an inverse phenomenon. Visual impressions of a mechanical character give birth to musical constitutions closely associated with them. If we examine carefully the scheme of 'Horace Victorieux' as it has been set down by Honegger himself, we may notice that even there the programme is conceived in a series of concise visual images which the composer expresses by the music."

"Honegger, it also appears, has long been enamored of locomotives. His friend, the publisher of the Swiss journal of music, Dissonance, once descried him at Zurich standing rapt before a poster of a huge 'Pacific.' The composer explained that from childhood locomotives had fascinated him. He admired them and loved them. In fact, to his rooms he took his friend and there exhibited a whole collection of drawings, designs and the like that he had accumulated—all about locomotives. They stirred in him lively sensations. Sooner or later, he hinted, he would translate them into music.

"Dr. Zederbaum tells the story, and supplements it with Honegger's own explanatory note to the finished piece. 'I have always loved locomotives,' writes Honegger, 'and passioned myself for them. To me, they are alive having a being of their own. What I have sought to accomplish in "Pacific" is not to imitate the noises of a locomotive. I have tried to imbue a musical framework with a visual impression and a feeling of physical joy. The music begins with an objective contemplation—the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour. As an example, I have chosen a locomotive of the Pacific 231 type, for heavy trains at high speed.'"

Another novelty on the bill is to be Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a little scherzo received so enthusiastically at a recent Boston Symphony concert that it had to be repeated and thus broke the age-old no-encore rule. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are also listed. Marguerite d'Alvarez, Peruvian contralto, will be the soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS,
LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
NOV 9 1924

Koussevitzky, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, apparently has risen to the musical heights demanded of the maestro of that famous organization. Comment upon his handling of the superb group of instrumentalists has been uniformly favorable, and it has been found that the new director possesses the desirable combination of reverence for the classic tradition and a musical mind open to the finer things of ultra modernism. There is no danger of Koussevitzky's being carried away by the purely freakish, nor yet that he will deny his hearers an opportunity to judge for themselves the merits of "Pacific 231," "King David" or other oddities by Honegger and his kind.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 9 192

The Boston Symphony program for the next concerts, Nov 21 and 22, includes Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; a symphony in C by Boccherini, a composer chiefly remembered nowadays on the strength of a single celebrated minuet and some pieces for cello; Debussy's "La mer"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." There is no soloist. Would that there were never going to be any soloists at these

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
NOV 9 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under its famous new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, comes to Buffalo on Thursday evening of this week, November 13th, with a concert at Elmwood Music hall, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. There has been a slight change in the programme originally announced, but one for the better. A concerto for orchestra by C. P. E. Bach will take the place of the Arensky variations on a Tschaikewsky theme and the overture will be from Weber, instead of Wagner. Very interesting is the recent comment by Ernest Newman, the great English critic, on Koussevitzky. He says:

America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him as they do about every conductor. I have often found himself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all. Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying, apropos of Tristan, "Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been cold as ice." What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that directs the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does, but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master.

Dubinouchka by Rimsky-Korsakoff is a variant of the Voga boatmen's song and the scherzo from the same composer's fairy opera, the Legend of Tsar Saltan, The Flight of the Bumble Bee, is a charming bit of orchestral writing, to which, in the opera, are added voice parts. The stage direction reads: "Out of the sea comes a bumble bee and flies about the swan." This scherzo when played recently in Boston, was so persistently applauded that Koussevitzky was forced to grant an encore, for the first time in the last two score of years in the history of the Boston symphony. The full programme for Thursday evening reads:

Concerto for orchestra in D major...
C. P. E. Bach
(Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.)
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto.
III. Allegro.
Overture to Oberon .....Weber
Vocalize (arranged for orchestra by the composer) .....Rachmaninoff
Dubinouchka (Russian folk song)....
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Prelude to the opera Khovantchina..
Moussorgsky
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, scherzo from the opera Tsar Saltan.....
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 .....Beethoven

—ncert

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
NOV 9 1924

Pacific 231.

Yes, it is meant to typify a western railroad locomotive—Pacific 231. And the strange part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Groupe des Six . . . numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony introduced Pacific 231 to the world... on May 8 last in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

Pacific 231 cannot be classified with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element, and since Honegger (a Swiss born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to dipict thru the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace over the rails. It is freak music which will subside as the power does from a "dead" engine.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
DEMOCRAT
NOV 9 1924

A WORDY BATTLE.

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzy, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Mr. Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are variously received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the post-office department and had denominated the capital of Soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the Soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the Red-hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adotped by the czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

It is small matter, perhaps, yet it reveals an amusing state of mind when "Treason" is shouted because a man uses a city name approved by its temporary rulers. If the Russians choose to call their capital Leningrad, Leningrad it is, however much one may dislike the notions of those who renamed it. As the Boston Herald points out, if, by some awful chance, Washington should be renamed Bryanville without the general consent of the citizens of this nation, Bryanville would be its name, and would so be recognized in political, literary, journalistic and even musical circles.—Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
NOV 9 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Distinguished new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will give a concert in Elmwood Music hall next Thursday evening, November 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

OMAHA, NEB.
World-Herald

NOV 9 1924

Boston Forgets History.

For the historians of a thousand years from now, when they sit down to write their books upon the curious ways of the people of the United States in 1924, there will be as much and as good material as the Dark Ages have furnished for the scriveners of our own day.

Even erudite Boston will command their amazed attention. For in learned Boston the very walls of the city are still trembling from a tremendous tumult which arose because the famous Russian conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Koussevitzsky, had printed on a program-book the word "Leningrad", where the people thought St. Petersburg ought to be. St. Petersburg would have been reminiscent of the acceptable reigns of the tsars; Leningrad was taken to typify a tolerance for the more recent governmental institutions of Russia with which Boston does not agree and of which therefore, Boston will not be reminded.

Boston, of course, with all its learning, forgot that Peter the Great, for whom St. Petersburg was named, was quite as much of a devil in his day as was Lenin in his. Lenin incurred opprobrium only for his politics. Peter was just as politically unorthodox and scandalizing, and he was also demonaically cruel, ruthless and blood thirsty. Peter was a democrat who clipped the beards of the aristocrats with his own hand, a man who so far forgot the canons of the aristocratic scheme of things as to become a common ship carpenter in Holland. He did away with the ancient order of political preferment upon the basis of aristocratic lineage, and made merit the only qualification for officeholding. He made the court fool his teacher. He enlisted in his own navy as a "gob" and in his own army as a private. He lived with his workmen in a little two-room hut. He placed a tax on the beards which had always been the distinguishing marks of aristocracy and forbade by a ukase the ornate clothing of the higher classes, prescribing common fustian jackets instead.

He advocated the most ruthless means of accomplishing his reforms. "If the land be over-burdened with weeds it must be burned with fire before new corn can grow," wrote one of his propagandists, "and in the same way our ancient and inveterate evils must also be burned out with fire." Lenin was no less considerate than that.

Peter also crowned a woman empress of the Russias when he designated Catherine as his successor, defying the violent protest which such a shock of innovation brought forth.

He drove hundreds of people into the marshes which covered the territory upon which St. Petersburg is built and made them erect the city in spite of the fact that they died off like flies.

Lenin, in his lifetime, neither effected nor preached more revolutionary doctrines than did Peter. Lenin never sacrificed human lives as ruthlessly, in all the revolutions, as Peter sacrificed them. Lenin never sat as dangerous an example to incite the proletariat of the twentieth century against prevailing forms of government as Peter set for the peoples of the seventeenth century against the holy aristocracy of divine right kings and despots.

Still, while St. Petersburg is a holy and wholesome name in learned Boston, and quite fit to be printed for the eyes of the people, Leningrad must be tabu, as something unholy and unwholesome and contaminating, something to be squelched lest it lead to bloody revolutions on Boston common and sovietism on Beacon hill

Monitor
Nov 8

Mr. Koussevitzky in a Conventional Program

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Beethoven,
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"
Mozart.....Symphony in G Minor
Debussy,
Two Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fêtes")
Moussorgsky,
"Pictures at an Exhibition" (orchestrated by Ravel)

This was by far the most taxing program Mr. Koussevitzky has thus far attempted, as it consisted for the most part of music which scarcely provides opportunities for the display of those qualities peculiar to himself (we will hardly venture on the word "tricks") in which Mr. Koussevitzky delights. There were no tremendous climaxes to be worked up, no startling examples of modernity to disturb the comfortable enjoyment of the afternoon, for Debussy's Nocturnes are now accepted as regular members of the repertory along with Haydn symphonies and the overtures of Weber. Even Moussorgsky's "Exhibition" is conventional enough except in the titles of its several parts. It does, in passing, contain one movement which is sure to endear Mr. Koussevitzky still further to the patrons of these concerts—the "ballet of chickens in their shells"—if that were still possible since his playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," which now bids fair to be the most popular and successful number in his repertory.

Be it to Mr. Koussevitzky's credit that, there being no suitable opportunities for the introduction of Koussevitzkyisms, he refrained from them. But alas! how tame, after the last four weeks. Even in this short period we have grown accustomed to a highly spiced musical diet and this sudden return to a Mozart symphony played in the most conventional of conventional manners, save for one meaningless little hurrying in the first movement, is disconcerting. Already we expect our Mozart our Beethoven, our Weber, à la Koussevitzky, but it appears that Mr. Koussevitzky has not yet worked out a version of the Mozart G minor Symphony. Truth to tell, a conductor of the virtuoso type, as Mr. Koussevitzky most certainly is, is bound to find it difficult to sustain the interest of 24 successive concerts. They cannot all consist of the pieces or of the kind of music in which he excels and there are bound to be dull moments. It is taxing on all concerned when the chief interest of the concert centers around the conductor, and this is not said in disparagement of the present conductor of the symphony concerts, who is to be taken as he is. It was felt that a conductor of "personality" was needed for these concerts. A conductor of undoubted personality has most undoubtedly been secured.

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" is only mildly exciting. Even Ravel's orchestration only slightly increases the interest, masterly though it is. Its coloring is familiar, and brilliant as it is, it scarcely conceals the poverty of the harmonic and melodic framework which it is designed to clothe. So Moussorgsky is a great musical genius! The greater part of his music has been arranged or rewritten by someone else, and even so its originality is difficult to discover. Is not this veneration of Moussorgsky somewhat of a pose on the part of a certain group of musicians and writers, just as the Parisian "Six" are said to hold in particular esteem the music of Ambroise Thomas and Mendelssohn, an attitude which it is difficult to believe is sincere.

One more question. Why did not Mr. Koussevitsky permit the audience to applaud between the two Nocturnes of Debussy. There is perhaps a shadow of a reason for not permitting applause between the several movements of a symphony, though in the "classic" symphony at least there is little real relationship between them. But Debussy's Nocturnes are two distinct compositions. Applause is no more disturbing than the rustling and general squirming which now takes its place. S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

NOV 9 1924

Pacific 231.

Yes, it is meant to typify a Western railroad locomotive—Pacific 231. And the strange part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Groupe des Six . . . numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony introduced Pacific 231 to the world . . . on May 8 last in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

Pacific 231 cannot be classified with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element, and since Honegger (a Swiss, born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to depict through the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace over the rails. It is freak music which will subside as the power does from a "dead" engine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH
PENNSYLVANIA
PRESS

NOV 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS THIS WEEK

Opening the local orchestra season the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Syria mosque, Friday night and Saturday matinee, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. The orchestra numbers 104 musicians.

The following programs will be played:

FRIDAY EVENING.

Bach, C. P. E.—Concerto for orchestra in D Major.
Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont" Op. 84.
Moussorgsky—Pictures at an Exhibition (Arr. for orchestra by M. Ravel).
Brahms—Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Mozart—Symphony in G minor (Kochel No. 550).
Arensky—Variations on a Theme by Tchaikovsky.
Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9.
Moussorgsky—Prelude to the opera, "Khovantchina."
Rimsky-Korsakov—"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from the opera, "Tsar Saltan."
Scriabin—The poem of "Ecstasy," Op. 54.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER

NOV 9 1924

The program in which the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music hall next Thursday evening, November 13th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, is one which should provide ample scope for the play of Serge Koussevitzky's volcanic temperament. In the Beethoven fifth symphony, the Bach concerto and the works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky and other Russian composers, the controlled fire of the new Russian conductor's personality should find its fullest opportunity for expression. There has been so much discussion of Koussevitzky's nervous intensity, it is interesting to read Ernest Newman's comment in a recent issue of the "American Mercury."

The great English music critic says: "America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him as they do about every conductor. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so coll throught it all."

One of the Russian works included in the program. "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is a charming Scherzo from the composer's fairy opera "Tsar Sultan." When this piece was performed in Boston recently, Koussevitzky was forced by persistent applause to grant an encore, the first time the Boston symphony had given an encore in forty years.

The program reads:

Concerti for orchestra in D major, (arr. by Maxmilian Steinberg).....C. P. E. Bach
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
"Vocalize" (arr. for orchestra by the composer).....Rachmaninov
"Dubinouchka" (Russian Folk Song).....Rimsky-Korsakov
Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina".....Moussorgsky
"The Filght of the Bumble Bee" Scherzo, from the Opera "Tsar Salton"..Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, op. 67.....Beethoven

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

187

Advertiser
Nov

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given under Serge Koussevitzky on December 1, January 12, February 9, March 30, April 27. The soloists will be Dusolina Gianfinni, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera; Mieczyslaw Munz, Polish pianist; John Charles Thomas, baritone; Myra Hess, pianist, and Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the Symphony.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts the week after next, when the orchestra returns from its short tour, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, DeBussy's sketches, "The Sea"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Strauss' symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

NOV 9 1924

Pacific 231

Yes, it is meant to typify a Western railroad locomotive—Pacific 231. And the strang part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Group des Six . . . numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony introduced Pacific 231 to the world . . . on May 8 last in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

Pacific 231 cannot be classified with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element, and since Honegger (a Swiss, born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to depict through the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace over the rails. It is freak music which will subside as the power does from a "dead" engine.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

NOV 9 19

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week. The orchestra is going not to New York city but to Buffalo and Pittsburg. Koussevitzky's New York debut comes Thanksgiving night. The seat sale for the New York concerts have been larger than for several seasons past, but seats are still to be had.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

V 9 1924

Boston Orchestra To Give Two Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two concerts in Syria Mosque this week, one on Friday night and the other Saturday afternoon. At the Friday concert there will be played Moussorgsky's piano suite. This will be only the second time this score has been played in America. Its first American performance was given at the Boston concerts Friday and last night under Koussevitsky.

Arensky's, Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky; the prelude to "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," will be played at Saturday's concert.

Herald
Nov 9

PROGRAM FOR SIXTH SYMPHONY

The sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the coming week will be occupied by the first tour of the orchestra, which will include concerts in Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh. The program for Nov. 21 and 22 will include: Mozart, Overture to "Marriage of Figaro"; Boccherini, Symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy, "The Sea"; Wagner, A Siegfried Idyll; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 9 1924

There is a marked improvement in the caliber of the soloists announced for the five extra Monday Symphony concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, Dec. 1, Jan 12, Feb 9, March 30 and April 27. Myra Hess will be heard March 30. Dusolina Giannini, who has been praised both for voice and for musicianship as no other young singer in a generation has been praised, will make her Boston debut as soloist in this series. Mieczyslaw Munz, youthful Polish pianist, much admired by many who heard him here in Jordan Hall recitals, and the popular baritone, John Charles Thomas, are the other visiting soloists. Mr Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, will also be heard as soloist.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy, on November 28, is doing things never done before at the Orchestra's Boston concerts. He is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America, and if his interpretations of the classical symphonies such as Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' Fourth are not strictly according to the letter of tradition, his readings are so eloquent and persuasive that they have met with general enthusiasm and no dissenting voice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Sun
NOV 10 1924

14-15

Boston

One Friday afternoon, years ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Muck at the wheel—played Chabrier's rhapsody, España—brilliant, flaming. The audience roared approbation, kept on roaring. Dr. Muck looked worried. He turned back the page of the score, looked at the audience, look at the orchestra. Plainly they wanted the piece again. Plainly he wanted to give it to them. But precedent — sacred precedent — forbade repetition. Dr. Muck's courage failed him. After all, Boston was Boston. He went on to the next number.

The other day Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the same organization, played Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo of the Bee. The audience liked it—liked its imaginative humor, its showiness. They clapped loud and long. The piece is very short. Without hesitation, Mr. Koussevitzky turned back the page, lifted his wand; the Scherzo of the Bee was replayed.

Precedent tumbled about his ears—but the audience was pleased. The police refrained from intervention. No bolt fell from Heaven. No harm appears to have come of the episode.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Everything is in readiness for the concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra at the armory tonight. The orchestra will include 105 instrumentalists, and the concert will mark the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who has had a veritable triumph since his engagement began in the early fall. Officials of the orchestra management have been in town since Saturday getting the armory in preparation for the event. The entire organization will arrive in the city early this afternoon. The seat sales for the concert will continue at the stores of the Barney company, the Wallace company and Cluett and Sons until 6 o'clock, when they will be transferred to the armory box office. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin. Prompt attendance is requested as no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. It is evident that the program of the concert, as published in The Gazette of Saturday, meets with unanimous approval, so general is the satisfaction expressed.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 10 1924

Boston Symphony Concert.

A red letter event in the musical annals of Schenectady will be the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 men at the State Armory tonight and it is pleasing to be able to report that an immense audience will be present to enjoy the event. The concert is made memorable by the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the ne wconductor of the organization, who has had a brilliant success since he began hi engagement in the early fall. Officials of the organization have bee in town since Saturday preparing th armory for the concert, and early th afternoon the entire membership of the orchestra arrived in town, adding interest to the occasion. The seat sales are being held at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company, and the Barney Company, and will continue until six o'clock when they will be transferred to the armory box office. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin. Prompt attendance is requested and it is well to remember that no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. The program, as announced in the UNION-STAR of Saturday, meets with absolute approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
NOV 10 1924

Koussevitzky Novelties

Scores introduced to Boston by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra include: Professor Koffeff's "Scythian Suite" which was performed in Symphony Hall October 24 and 25; Albert Roussel's Symphony, Op. 23, which had its first American performances October 31 and November 1; and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Ravel, which had their first American performance last week. There has been no dissension in the general praise of this conductor's readings of such classical symphonies as the Fifth of Beethoven and the Fourth of Brahms, which have figured recently at these concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky's New York debut will take place in Carnegie Hall, November 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
NOV 10 1924

CONCERTS BEGIN TONIGHT.

The musicl program to be presented this winter in Albany, Troy and Schenectady, by the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society will start tonight when the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at Schenectady. Tomorrow night the orchestra will play at Music hall, Troy.

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
~~POST~~
Telegraph
NOV 11 1924

WILL LECTURE ON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

The first program talk for the symphony orchestra season will be given tonight in the recital room of the main branch of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Bellefield avenue. The program of Friday night and Saturday afternoon by the Boston symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque will be analyzed and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. Charles N. Boyd will be the speaker. Two important symphonies will be included in the talk tonight, Brahms No. 4 in E minor and Mozart's Symphony in G minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
NOV 11 1924

Among those from Amsterdam who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and its wonder conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, at the state armory at Schenectady, Monday evening, included Mr. and Mrs. Arthur P. Servoss, Mr. and Mrs. Harlan B. Hayes, Mrs. C. B. Machold, Miss Marion M. Rulison, Mrs. Adelbert Putman, Miss Bessie M. Putman, Mrs. Katherine Michaelson, Miss Ruth Ault, Miss Ruth Parker, Miss Alva G. Knapp, William J. Kline, William A. Gardner, John Canedy, Mrs. Cora H. Miller, Miss Jane McNeil, Durward H. Sisson and Isaac A. Morse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 12 1924

Why Not Leningrad?

Who has the right to name Russian cities? The question is raised anew by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who have, however, made decision for themselves by ordering Leningrad as the name of the old capital city erased from the orchestra programs. Whether they favor St. Petersburg or Petrograd is not stated but, whichever it may be, they will not assist in answering the question propounded above. It does not seem that, so far as Americans are concerned, it ever can be answered until de jure recognition is given the Moscow Communists.

The change from St. Petersburg came about logically in a time of popular detestation of everything Teutonically flavored. The Czar's government abolished the German style in favor of the Russian. St. Petersburg became Petrograd over night. This constituted an appropriate rebuke to Prussian arrogance and was widely recognized as a declaration of freedom by the Russian absolutist no less convincing of his noble purposes than his previous assertion that he would fight the common enemy "to the last moujik."

While Nicholas found it impossible to carry out all his announced intentions, Petrograd stuck as the former capital's name until the soviet decided to honor the dead monster Lenine by bestowing his name on the ruins of the once great city. This seems to be a purely domestic matter with which outsiders have no right to interfere. But Leningrad has not "gone down" with quite a lot of people, Americans included, and for reasons that do them credit, we'll say.

It doesn't make much difference now, but some day there will be another story. We do not recognize the soviet or any of its works. But we would recognize a decision by it to pay the debts of Russia to America. If we can recognize that can we reasonably refuse to recognize its right to name one-time St. Petersburg what it will? Are we not apt to give the soviet an exaggerated idea of its own importance by showing heat over this name?

FEEDING sugar to football players [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
~~EVE.~~ RECORD
morning
NOV 12 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS AT FIRST CHROMATIC EVENT

LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL HEARS FAMED ORGANIZATION IN CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its treasure chest last night at Music Hall and placed some of the most cherished riches of music at the disposal of an audience that received them with emphatic approval. These dispensers of beautiful music came to town a round hundred strong, numerous and able enough to enlarge the might of Beethoven's crashes, to rollick gayly through many pages of Moussorgsky, and to enter into the twilight moods of Brahms with an ease and brilliancy of technique seldom manifested in this community. Few Troy music lovers can recall today a concert so wholly entertaining throughout as the one they listened to last night. Its delightful and imaginative stimulus must become a permanent part of the experience of anyone privileged to hear it.

Any lover of orchestral music knows that the Boston Symphony Orcnestra consists of a body of skilled, well-routined players, whose conductor is a person of positive genius in his line. Mr. Koussevitzky upheld and enhanced the reputation which preceded him here. He did wonders for the concert with his crisp, galvanic conducting. But it was a delightfully unassuming performance on his part. There was no contortionist feature about it. His conducting was just wonderfully effective.

The program had all the variety which Bach, Beethoven and Brahms could give it. These names constitute the stellar triumvirate of composers of the variety of music to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra addresses itself. When to this imposing list is added a fourth, he completes the program given last night. The name, which now becomes one to conjure with, is Mussorgsky; until last night little known to this public. More of him later.

Bach's Concerto.

It is said of Bach that music owes to him what religion owes to its founder. If this is sacrilege we can only apologize and refer the reader to one of Bach's biographers. For one who has just listened through the Concerto in D Major, it is scarcely possible to avoid the comment that no tribute is too glowing to fit Bach, and the same shining praise can be bestowed upon the orchestra which interpreted his work last night. So excellent was the co-operation between this fine body of players and the composer himself that surely you would have said that Bach lived again. His Concerto was played with exquisite clarity, with continuous beauty of tone, with aristocratic ease, and fluent technique. It was a finely imagined performance. The program stated that Mr. Koussevitzky first heard the concerto in Paris, and was so delighted with it that he took it and turned the music over to Maximilian Steinberg to make an orchestral accompaniment. The result was the first number last night, and an unspeakably beautiful matter it was.

Beethoven was represented last night by his magnificent overture to Goethe's "Egmont," a sterling specimen of the later Beethoven. One authority says that Beethoven drew his inspiration from the cruel domination of the Netherlands by the Spaniards. However that may be it can be said with conviction that the music possesses grandeur, passion and pathos unexcelled. Its performance last night was a masterpiece in itself, the musicians entering accurately into the mood of the music, which ranged from fiery intensity to tenderness, all sounding forth with effortless perfection of technique, yet with abundant feeling.

The performance of Moussorgsky was a beautiful and a sympathetic achievement, which deserves a comfortable niche of its own in the affections of Troy music lovers. The players made a veritable holiday of this number. Its title was "Pictures at an Exhibition." Its composer is a Russian now dead, and whose works are being brought forth with great success in this country by the orchestra heard last night. The specimens given here were a series of piano pieces arranged for the orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The orchestra played them last night with evident enjoyment. The audience heard with even greater enjoyment. It was spirited, infectious music, with a nimble, prankish quality about it. The successive episodes, described on the program, were rendered in a way to give the keenest delight.

The Glories of Brahms.

Finally, came Brahms. The choice last night was the familiar fourth symphony. All the world knows that Brahms ranks among the masters of classical music as the peer of Beethoven and Bach, and as the inheritor of the finest traditions of the great school of German composers. Without dwelling further upon his place in the history of music, it can at least be said that the rendition of his fourth symphony last night will stand as one of the sensations of the season. Into this great work the composer poured the riches of his mind and heart. To its rendition last night an orchestra universally famous for excellence applied the precious distillate of its skill and experience. It was delightful enough to make an arduous journey to Troy's Music Hall worth while; to cause every music lover the land over to converge upon this town to hear it. As much of Troy's public as could comfortably find sitting space in Music Hall did arrive for the concert; but that one number by Brahms deserved an audience large enough to require overflow meetings in the side corridors, or even to fill so super-dimensional a receptacle as the Yale bowl. It placed the most severe demands upon the orchestra and its leader, and the orchestra rose to dramatic heights and finished the evening with a climax that left its impress firmly upon an audience that would enthusiastically demand the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Troy next season.

It was the first Chromatic concert of the present musical year. After all that has been said, it is scarcely necessary to mention that the affair was a distinct success, and that it augurs a banner twenty-eighth season for the Chromatic organization which brings such splendid musical events to Troy.

Herald
Nov 9

PROGRAM FOR SIXTH SYMPHONY

The sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the coming week will be occupied by the first tour of the orchestra, which will include concerts in Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh. The program for Nov. 21 and 22 will include: Mozart, Overture to "Marriage of Figaro"; Boccherini, Symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy, "The Sea"; Wagner, A Siegfried Idyll; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 9 1924

There is a marked improvement in the caliber of the soloists announced for the five extra Monday Symphony concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitsky, Dec 1, Jan 12, Feb 9, March 30 and April 27. Myra Hess will be heard March 30. Dusolina Giannini, who has been praised both for voice and for musicianship as no other young singer in a generation has been praised, will make her Boston debut as soloist in this series. Mieczyslaw Munz, youthful Polish pianist, much admired by many who heard him here in Jordan Hall recitals, and the popular baritone, John Charles Thomas, are the other visiting soloists. Mr Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, will also be heard as soloist.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy, on November 28, is doing things never done before at the Orchestra's Boston concerts. He is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America, and if his interpretations of the classical symphonies such as Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' Fourth are not strictly according to the letter of tradition, his readings are so eloquent and persuasive that they have met with general enthusiasm and no dissenting voice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Tribune
NOV 10 1924

14-12

Boston

One Friday afternoon, years ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Muck at the wheel—played Chabrier's rhapsody, España—brilliant, flaming. The audience roared approbation, kept on roaring. Dr. Muck looked worried. He turned back the page of the score, looked at the audience, look at the orchestra. Plainly they wanted the piece again. Plainly he wanted to give it to them. But precedent—sacred precedent—forbade repetition. Dr. Muck's courage failed him. After all, Boston was Boston. He went on to the next number.

The other day Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the same organization, played Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo of the Bee. The audience liked it—liked its imaginative humor, its showiness. They clapped loud and long. The piece is very short. Without hesitation, Mr. Koussevitzky turned back the page, lifted his wand; the Scherzo of the Bee was replayed.

Precedent tumbled about his ears—but the audience was pleased. The police refrained from intervention. No bolt fell from Heaven. No harm appears to have come of the episode.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Everything is in readiness for the concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra at the armory tonight. The orchestra will include 105 instrumentalists, and the concert will mark the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who has had a veritable triumph since his engagement began in the early fall. Officials of the orchestra management have been in town since Saturday getting the armory in preparation for the event. The entire organization will arrive in the city early this afternoon. The seat sales for the concert will continue at the stores of the Barney company, the Wallace company and Cluett and Sons until 6 o'clock, when they will be transferred to the armory box office. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin. Prompt attendance is requested as no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. It is evident that the program of the concert, as published in The Gazette of Saturday, meets with unanimous approval,, so general is the satisfaction expressed.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 10 1924

Boston Symphony Concert.

A red letter event in the musical annals of Schenectady will be the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 men at the State Armory tonight and it is pleasing to be able to report that an immense audience will be present to enjoy the event. The concert is made memorable by the appearance o Serge Koussevitzky, the ne wconductor of the organization, who has had a brilliant success since he began hi engagement in the early fall. Officials of the organization have bee in town since Saturday preparing th armory for the concert, and early th afternoon the entire membership the orchestra arrived in town, adding interest to the occasion. The seat sales are being held at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company, and the Barney Company, and will continue until six o'clock when they will be transferred to the armory box office. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin. Prompt attendance is requested and it is well to remember that no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. The program, as announced in the UNION-STAR of Saturday, meets with absolute approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
NOV 10 1924

Koussevitzky Novelties

Scores introduced to Boston by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra include: Professor Kofieff's "Scythian Suite" which was performed in Symphony Hall October 24 and 25; Albert Roussel's Symphony, Op. 23, which had its first American performances October 31 and November 1; and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Ravel, which had their first American performance last week. There has been no dissension in the general praise of this conductor's readings of such classical symphonies as the Fifth of Beethoven and the Fourth of Brahms, which have figured recently at these concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky's New York debut will take place in Carnegie Hall, November 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
NOV 10 1924

CONCERTS BEGIN TONIGHT.

The musicl program to be presented this winter in Albany, Troy and Schenectady, by the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society will start tonight when the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at Schenectady. Tomorrow night the orchestra will play at Music hall, Troy.

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
~~POST~~
Telegraph
NOV 11 1924

WILL LECTURE ON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

The first program talk for the symphony orchestra season will be given tonight in the recital room of the main branch of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Bellefield avenue. The program of Friday night and Saturday afternoon by the Boston symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque will be analyzed and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. Charles N. Boyd will be the speaker. Two important symphonies will be included in the talk tonight, Brahms No. 4 in E minor and Mozart's Symphony in G minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
NOV 11 1924

Among those from Amsterdam who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and its wonder conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, at the state armory at Schenectady, Monday evening, included Mr. and Mrs. Arthur P. Servoss, Mr. and Mrs. Harlan B. Hayes, Mrs. C. B. Machold, Miss Marion M. Rulison, Mrs. Adelbert Putman, Miss Bessie M. Putman, Mrs. Katherine Michaelson, Miss Ruth Ault, Miss Ruth Parker, Miss Alva G. Knapp, William J. Kline, William A. Gardner, John Canedy, Mrs. Cora H. Miller, Miss Jane McNeil, Durward H. Sisson and Isaac A. Morse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 12 1924

Why Not Leningrad?

Who has the right to name Russian ties? The question is raised anew by ne trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who have, however, made decision for themselves by ordering Leningrad as the name of the old capital city erased from the orchestra programs. Whether they favor St. Petersburg or Petrograd is not stated but, whichever it may be, they will not assist in answering the question propounded above. It does not seem that, so far as Americans are concerned, it ever can be answered until de jure recognition is given the Moscow Communists.

The change from St. Petersburg came about logically in a time of popular detestation of everything Teutonically flavored. The Czar's government abolished the German style in favor of the Russian. St. Petersburg became Petrograd over night. This constituted an appropriate rebuke to Prussian arrogance and was widely recognized as a declaration of freedom by the Russian absolutist no less convincing of his noble purposes than his previous assertion that he would fight the common enemy "to the last moujik."

While Nicholas found it impossible to carry out all his announced intentions, Petrograd stuck as the former capital's name until the soviet decided to honor the dead monster Lenine by bestowing his name on the ruins of the once great city. This seems to be a purely domestic matter with which outsiders have no right to interfere. But Leningrad has not "gone down" with quite a lot of people, Americans included, and for reasons that do them credit, we'll say.

It doesn't make much difference now, but some day there will be another story. We do not recognize the soviet or any of its works. But we would recognize a decision by it to pay the debts of Russia to America. If we can recognize that can we reasonably refuse to recognize its right to name one-time St. Petersburg what it will? Are we not apt to give the soviet an exaggerated idea of its own importance by showing heat over this name?

FEEDING sugar to football players to ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
~~EVE.~~ RECORD
Morning
NOV 12 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS AT FIRST CHROMATIC EVENT

LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL HEARS FAMED ORGANIZATION IN CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its treasure chest last night at Music Hall and placed some of the most cherished riches of music at the disposal of an audience that received them with emphatic approval. These dispensers of beautiful music came to town a round hundred strong, numerous and able enough to enlarge the might of Beethoven's crashes, to rollick gayly through many pages of Moussorgsky, and to enter into the twilight moods of Brahms with an ease and brilliancy of technique seldom manifested in this community. Few Troy music lovers can recall today a concert so wholly entertaining throughout as the one they listened to last night. Its delightful and imaginative stimulus must become a permanent part of the experience of anyone privileged to hear it.

Any lover of orchestral music knows that the Boston Symphony Orchestra consists of a body of skilled, well-routined players, whose conductor is a person of positive genius in his line. Mr. Koussevitzky upheld and enhanced the reputation which preceded him here. He did wonders for the concert with his crisp, galvanic conducting. But it was a delightfully unassuming performance on his part. There was no contortionist feature about it. His conducting was just wonderfully effective.

The program had all the variety which Bach, Beethoven and Brahms could give it. These names constitute the stellar triumvirate of composers of the variety of music to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra addresses itself. When to this imposing list is added a fourth, he completes the program given last night. The name, which now becomes one to conjure with, is Mussorgsky; until last night little known to this public. More of him later.

Bach's Concerto.

It is said of Bach that music owes to him what religion owes to its founder. If this is sacrilege we can only apologize and refer the reader to one of Bach's biographers. For one who has just listened through the Concerto in D Major, it is scarcely possible to avoid the comment that no tribute is too glowing to fit Bach, and the same shining praise can be bestowed upon the orchestra which interpreted his work last night. So excellent was the co-operation between this fine body of players and the composer himself that surely you would have said that Bach lived again. His Concerto was played with exquisite clarity, with continuous beauty of tone, with aristocratic ease, and fluent technique. It was a finely imagined performance. The program stated that Mr. Koussevitzky first heard the concerto in Paris, and was so delighted with it that he took it and turned the music over to Maximilian Steinberg to make an orchestral accompaniment. The result was the first number last night, and an unspeakably beautiful matter it was.

Beethoven was represented last night by his magnificent overture to Goethe's "Egmont," a sterling specimen of the later Beethoven. One authority says that Beethoven drew his inspiration from the cruel domination of the Netherlands by the Spaniards. However that may be it can be said with conviction that the music possesses grandeur, passion and pathos unexcelled. Its performance last night was a masterpiece in itself, the musicians entering accurately into the mood of the music, which ranged from fiery intensity to tenderness, all sounding forth with effortless perfection of technique, yet with abundant feeling.

The performance of Moussorgsky was a beautiful and a sympathetic achievement, which deserves a comfortable niche of its own in the affections of Troy music lovers. The players made a veritable holiday of this number. Its title was "Pictures at an Exhibition." Its composer is a Russian now dead, and whose works are being brought forth with great success in this country by the orchestra heard last night. The specimens given here were a series of piano pieces arranged for the orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The orchestra played them last night with evident enjoyment. The audience heard with even greater enjoyment. It was spirited, infectious music, with a nimble, prankish quality about it. The successive episodes, described on the program, were rendered in a way to give the keenest delight.

The Glories of Brahms.

Finally, came Brahms. The choice last night was the familiar fourth symphony. All the world knows that Brahms ranks among the masters of classical music as the peer of Beethoven and Bach, and as the inheritor of the finest traditions of the great school of German composers. Without dwelling further upon his place in the history of music, it can at least be said that the rendition of his fourth symphony last night will stand as one of the sensations of the season. Into this great work the composer poured the riches of his mind and heart. To its rendition last night an orchestra universally famous for excellence applied the precious distillate of its skill and experience. It was delightful enough to make an arduous journey to Troy's Music Hall worth while; to cause every music lover the land over to converge upon this town to hear it. As much of Troy's public as could comfortably find sitting space in Music Hall did arrive for the concert; but that one number by Brahms deserved an audience large enough to require overflow meetings in the side corridors, or even to fill so super-dimensional a receptacle as the Yale bowl. It placed the most severe demands upon the orchestra and its leader, and the orchestra rose to dramatic heights and finished the evening with a climax that left its impress firmly upon an audience that would enthusiastically demand the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Troy next season.

It was the first Chromatic concert of the present musical year. After all that has been said, it is scarcely necessary to mention that the affair was a distinct success, and that it augurs a banner twenty-eighth season for the Chromatic organization which brings such splendid musical events to Troy.

Herald
Nov 9

PROGRAM FOR SIXTH SYMPHONY

The sixth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the coming week will be occupied by the first tour of the orchestra, which will include concerts in Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh. The program for Nov. 21 and 22 will include: Mozart, Overture to "Marriage of Figaro"; Boccherini, Symphony in C major, Op. 16, No. 3; Debussy, "The Sea"; Wagner, A Siegfried Idyll; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 9 1924

There is a marked improvement in the caliber of the soloists announced for the five extra Monday Symphony concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, Dec 1, Jan 12, Feb 9, March 30 and April 27. Myra Hess will be heard March 30. Dusolina Giannini, who has been praised both for voice and for musicianship as no other young singer in a generation has been praised, will make her Boston debut as soloist in this series. Mieczyslaw Munz, youthful Polish pianist, much admired by many who heard him here in Jordan Hall recitals, and the popular baritone, John Charles Thomas, are the other visiting soloists. Mr Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, will also be heard as soloist.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to make his debut at the Brooklyn opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season at the Academy, on November 28, is doing things never done before at the Orchestra's Boston concerts. He is introducing scores hitherto unheard in America, and if his interpretations of the classical symphonies such as Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' Fourth are not strictly according to the letter of tradition, his readings are so eloquent and persuasive that they have met with general enthusiasm and no dissenting voice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Post
NOV 10 1924

Boston

One Friday afternoon, years ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Muck at the wheel—played Chabrier's rhapsody, España—brilliant, flaming. The audience roared approbation, kept on roaring. Dr. Muck looked worried. He turned back the page of the score, looked at the audience, look at the orchestra. Plainly they wanted the piece again. Plainly he wanted to give it to them. But precedent — sacred precedent — forbade repetition. Dr. Muck's courage failed him. After all, Boston was Boston. He went on to the next number.

The other day Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the same organization, played Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo of the Bee. The audience liked it—liked its imaginative humor, its showiness. They clapped loud and long. The piece is very short. Without hesitation, Mr. Koussevitzky turned back the page, lifted his wand; the Scherzo of the Bee was replayed.

Precedent tumbled about his ears—but the audience was pleased. The police refrained from intervention. No bolt fell from Heaven. No harm appears to have come of the episode.

. . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Everything is in readiness for the concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra at the armory tonight. The orchestra will include 105 instrumentalists, and the concert will mark the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who has had a veritable triumph since his engagement began in the early fall. Officials of the orchestra management have been in town since Saturday getting the armory in preparation for the event. The entire organization will arrive in the city early this afternoon. The seat sales for the concert will continue at the stores of the Barney company, the Wallace company and Cluett and Sons until 6 o'clock, when they will be transferred to the armory box office. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin. Prompt attendance is requested as no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. It is evident that the program of the concert, as published in The Gazette of Saturday, meets with unanimous approval,, so general is the satisfaction expressed.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
NOV 10 1924

Boston Symphony Concert.

A red letter event in the musical annals of Schenectady will be the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 men at the State Armory tonight and it is pleasing to be able to report that an immense audience will be present to enjoy the event. The concert is made memorable by the appearance o Serge Koussevitzky, the ne wconductor of the organization, who has ha a brilliant success since he began hi engagement in the early fall. Of ficials of the organization have bee in town since Saturday preparing th armory for the concert, and early th afternoon the entire membership the orchestra arrived in town, adding interest to the occasion. The seat sales are being held at the stores of Cluett and Sons, the Wallace Company, and the Barney Company, and will continue until six o'clock when they will be transferred to the armory box office. The concert is given under the management of Ben Franklin. Prompt attendance is requested and it is well to remember that no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing. The program, as announced in the UNION-STAR of Saturday, meets with absolute approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
NOV 10 1924

Koussevitzky Novelties

Scores introduced to Boston by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra include: Professor Kofieff's "Scythian Suite" which was performed in Symphony Hall October 24 and 25; Albert Roussel's Symphony, Op. 23, which had its first American performances October 31 and November 1; and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Ravel, which had their first American performance last week. There has been no dissension in the general praise of this conductor's readings of such classical symphonies as the Fifth of Beethoven and the Fourth of Brahms, which have figured recently at these concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky's New York debut will take place in Carnegie Hall, November 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS
NOV 10 1924

CONCERTS BEGIN TONIGHT.

The musicl program to be presented this winter in Albany, Troy and Schenectady, by the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society will start tonight when the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at Schenectady. Tomorrow night the orchestra will play at Music hall, Troy.

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
~~POST~~
Telegraph
NOV 11 1924

WILL LECTURE ON ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

The first program talk for the symphony orchestra season will be given tonight in the recital room of the main branch of the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Bellefield avenue. The program of Friday night and Saturday afternoon by the Boston symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque will be analyzed and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. Charles N. Boyd will be the speaker. Two important symphonies will be included in the talk tonight, Brahms No. 4 in E minor and Mozart's Symphony in G minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER
NOV 11 1924

Among those from Amsterdam who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and its wonder conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, at the state armory at Schenectady, Monday evening, included Mr. and Mrs. Arthur P. Servoss, Mr. and Mrs. Harlan B. Hayes, Mrs. C. B. Machold, Miss Marion M. Rulison, Mrs. Adelbert Putman, Miss Bessie M. Putman, Mrs. Katherine Michaelson, Miss Ruth Ault, Miss Ruth Parker, Miss Alva G. Knapp, William J. Kline, William A. Gardner, John Canedy, Mrs. Cora H. Miller, Miss Jane McNeil, Durward H. Sisson and Isaac A. Morse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 12 1924

Why Not Leningrad?

Who has the right to name Russian ties? The question is raised anew by ne trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who have, however, made decision for themselves by ordering Leningrad as the name of the old capital city erased from the orchestra programs. Whether they favor St. Petersburg or Petrograd is not stated but, whichever it may be, they will not assist in answering the question propounded above. It does not seem that, so far as Americans are concerned, it ever can be answered until de jure recognition is given the Moscow Communists.

The change from St. Petersburg came about logically in a time of popular detestation of everything Teutonically flavored. The Czar's government abolished the German style in favor of the Russian. St. Petersburg became Petrograd over night. This constituted an appropriate rebuke to Prussian arrogance and was widely recognized as a declaration of freedom by the Russian absolutist no less convincing of his noble purposes than his previous assertion that he would fight the common enemy "to the last moujik."

While Nicholas found it impossible to carry out all his announced intentions, Petrograd stuck as the former capital's name until the soviet decided to honor the dead monster Lenine by bestowing his name on the ruins of the once great city. This seems to be a purely domestic matter with which outsiders have no right to interfere. But Leningrad has not "gone down" with quite a lot of people, Americans included, and for reasons that do them credit, we'll say.

It doesn't make much difference now, but some day there will be another story. We do not recognize the soviet or any of its works. But we would h recognize a decision by it to pay the w debts of Russia to America. If we can recognize that can we reasonably refuse to recognize its right to name one-time

St. Petersburg what it will? Are w not apt to give the soviet an exaggerate idea of its own importance by showing heat over this name?

FEEDING sugar to football [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
~~EVE~~. RECORD
Morning
NOV 12 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS AT FIRST CHROMATIC EVENT

LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL HEARS FAMED ORGANIZATION IN CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its treasure chest last night at Music Hall and placed some of the most cherished riches of music at the disposal ot an audience that received them with emphatic approval. These dispensers of beautiful music came to town a round hundred strong, numerous and able enough to enlarge the might of Beethoven's crashes, to rollick gayly through many pages of Moussorgsky, and to enter into the twilight moods of Brahms with an ease and brilliancy of technique seldom manifested in this community. Few Troy music lovers can recall today a concert so wholly entertaining throughout as the one they listened to last night. Its delightful and imaginative stimulus must become a permanent part of the experience of anyone privileged to hear it.

Any lover of orchestral music knows that the Boston Symphony Orchestra consists of a body of skilled, well-routined players, whose conductor is a person of positive genius in his line. Mr. Koussevitzky upheld and enhanced the reputation which preceded him here. He did wonders for the concert with his crisp, galvanic conducting. But it was a delightfully unassuming performance on his part. There was no contortionist feature about it. His conducting was just wonderfully effective.

The program had all the variety which Bach, Beethoven and Brahms could give it. These names constitute the stellar triumvirate of composers of the variety of music to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra addresses itself. When to this imposing list is added a fourth, he completes the program given last night. The name, which now becomes one to conjure with, is Mussorgsky; until last night little known to this public. More of him later.

Bach's Concerto.

It is said of Bach that music owes to him what religion owes to its founder. If this is sacrilege we can only apologize and refer the reader to one of Bach's biographers. For one who has just listened through the Concerto in D Major, it is scarcely possible to avoid the comment that no tribute is too glowing to fit Bach, and the same shining praise can be bestowed upon the orchestra which interpreted his work last night. So excellent was the co-operation between this fine body of players and the composer himself that surely you would have said that Bach lived again. His Concerto was played with exquisite clarity, with continuous beauty of tone, with aristocratic ease, and fluent technique. It was a finely imagined performance. The program stated that Mr. Koussevitzky first heard the concerto in Paris, and was so delighted with it that he took it and turned the music over to Maximilian Steinberg to make an orchestral accompaniment. The result was the first number last night, and an unspeakably beautiful matter it was.

Beethoven was represented last night by his magnificent overture to Goethe's "Egmont," a sterling specimen of the later Beethoven. One authority says that Beethoven drew his inspiration from the cruel domination of the Netherlands by the Spaniards. However that may be it can be said with conviction that the music possesses grandeur, passion and pathos unexcelled. Its performance last night was a masterpiece in itself, the musicians entering accurately into the mood of the mu[illegible]ed from fiery in-

Wasg[illegible]
y Other Thrillings Magazine for De-with startling con-thrill and astonish romance.
ord of Valentino's eading "Two Can —a wife's story for r their husbands;
he amazing confession of a good
"Trial Marria girls who might the Man"—th flapper who u her stenographe Bound Souls" innocent countr self against a re frankness.
rare treat in gazine.

TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 1 2 1924

DELIGHTS AT FIRST CHROMATIC EVENT

LARGE AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL HEARS CONCERT

BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its treasure chest last night at Music Hall and placed some of the most cherished riches of music at the disposal of an audience that received them with emphatic approval. These dispensers of beautiful music came to town a round hundred strong, numerous and able enough to enlarge the might of Beethoven's crashes, to rollick gayly through many pages of Moussorgsky, and to enter into the twilight moods of Brahms with an ease and brilliancy of technique seldom manifested in this community. Few Troy music lovers can recall today a concert so wholly entertaining throughout as the one they listened to last night. Its delightful and imaginative stimulus must become a permanent part of the experience of anyone privileged to hear it.

Any lover of orchestral music knows that the Boston Symphony Orchestra consists of a body of skilled, well-routined players, whose conductor is a person of positive genius in his line. Mr. Koussevitzky upheld and enhanced the reputation which preceded him here. He did wonders for the concert with his crisp, galvanic conducting. But it was a delightfully unassuming performance on his part. There was no contortionist feature about it. His conducting was just wonderfully effective.

The program had all the variety which Bach, Beethoven and Brahms could give it. These names constitute the stellar triumvirate of composers of the variety of music to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra addresses itself. When to this imposing list is added a fourth, he completes the program given last night. The name, which now becomes one to conjure with, is Mussorgsky; until last night little known to this public. More of him later.

Bach's Concerto.

It is said of Bach that music owes to him what religion owes to its founder. If this is sacrilege we can only apologize and refer the reader to one of Bach's biographers. For one who has just listened through the Concerto in D Major, it is scarcely possible to avoid the comment that no tribute is too glowing to fit Bach, and the same shining praise can be bestowed upon the orchestra which interpreted his work last night. So excellent was the co-operation between this fine body of players and the composer himself that surely you would have said that Bach lived again. His Concerto was played with exquisite clarity, with continuous beauty of tone, with aristocratic ease, and fluent technique. It was a finely imagined performance. The program stated that Mr. Koussevitzky first heard the concerto in Paris, and was so delighted with it that he took it and turned the music over to Maximilian Steinberg to make an orchestral accompaniment. The result was the first number last night, and an unspeakably beautiful matter it was.

Beethoven was represented last night by his magnificent overture to Goethe's "Egmont," a sterling specimen of the later Beethoven. One authority says that Beethoven drew his inspiration from the cruel domination of the Netherlands by the Spaniards. However that may be it can be said with conviction that the music possesses grandeur, passion and pathos unexcelled. Its performance last night was a masterpiece in itself, the musicians entering accurately into the mood of the music, which ranged from fiery intensity to tenderness, all sounding forth with effortless perfection of technique, yet with abundant feeling.

The performance of Moussorgsky was a beautiful and a sympathetic achievement, which deserves a comfortable niche of its own in the affections of Troy music lovers. The players made a veritable holiday of this number. Its title was "Pictures at an Exhibition." Its composer is a Russian now dead, and whose works are being brought forth with great success in this country by the orchestra heard last night. The specimens given here were a series of piano pieces arranged for the orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The orchestra played them last night with evident enjoyment. The audience heard with even greater enjoyment. It was spirited, infectious music, with a nimble, prankish quality about it. The successive episodes, described on the program, were rendered in a way to give the keenest delight.

The Glories of Brahms.

Finally, came Brahms. The choice last night was the familiar fourth symphony. All the world knows that Brahms ranks among the masters of classical music as the peer of Beethoven and Bach, and as the inheritor of the finest traditions of the great school of German composers. Without dwelling further upon his place in the history of music, it can at least be said that the rendition of his fourth symphony last night will stand as one of the sensations of the season. Into this great work the composer poured the riches of his mind and heart. To its rendition last night an orchestra universally famous for excellence applied the precious distillate of its skill and experience. It was delightful enough to make an arduous journey to Troy's Music Hall worth while; to cause every music lover the land over to converge upon this town to hear it. As much of Troy's public as could comfortably find sitting space in Music Hall did arrive for the concert; but that one number by Brahms deserved an audience large enough to require overflow meetings in the side corridors, or even to fill so super-dimensional a receptacle as the Yale bowl. It placed the most severe demands upon the orchestra and its leader, and the orchestra rose to dramatic heights and finished the evening with a climax that left its impress firmly upon an audience that would enthusiastically demand the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Troy next season.

It was the first Chromatic concert of the present musical year. After all that has been said, it is scarcely necessary to mention that the affair was a distinct success, and that it augurs a banner twenty-eighth season for the Chromatic organization which brings such splendid musical events to Troy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
NOV 1 2 1924

Boston Symphony Here For Concert Tonight

A large audience is assured for the first of the university series of concerts to be held this evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Bailey Hall under the direction of its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

The program to be given includes four of the most interesting compositions of famous composers, there being nothing strictly of the modern school on the orchestra's list for this evening, although the interesting pictures of Moussorgsky are of the type usually referred to as descriptive music.

The complete program is as follows:

Concerto for orchestra in D major .....C. P. E. Bach Arrangement of Maximilian Steinberg
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante lento moto.
III. Allegro.
Overture to Egmont, Op. 84 ..... Beethoven
Pictures at an Exposition ..... Moussorgsky
Arrangement of Maurice Ravel
Intermission.
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 38 ..... Brahm
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocose.
IV. Allegro energico epassionate.

Prof. Otto Kinkeldey last evening gave an interesting lecture on the symphony program before an audience which filled the lecture room in Morse Hall. The speaker presented brief resumes of the life and works of the composers, and explained the compositions, illustrating his talk by playing the more important parts on the piano.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 1 2 1924

Boston Symphony Here This Week

A rare musical treat is promised this week in the visit of the Boston symphony orchestra for two concerts at Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The orchestra will come with 104 musicians under the celebrated new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The symphony for Friday night is "Brahms No. 4 in E minor," and for Saturday afternoon, "Mozart's Symphony in G minor."

Other works of interest include "Bach Concerto for orchestra in D minor, Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera "Tsar Sulton," and Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
NOV 1 2 1924

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

Concert seat sales open here; Dal Monte's Chicago triumph.

Today at Denton, Cottier & Daniels the seat sale for the Buffalo Symphony orchestra group of concerts for the season of 1924-25 will open. The first concert takes place this Sunday afternoon, November 16th. This year a greater number of subscriptions were taken for this event than ever before. Tickets for the group of five may be bought as well as single tickets for this Sunday's concert. Richard Habeman, the conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, will conduct two numbers, one a concerto for the piano composed and played as soloist by the Buffalo Symphony's own conductor, Arnold Cornelissen.

Seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening is now open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Miss Bessie Bellanca is local manager of the concert. Many are curious to see the new Russian conductor, Koussevitsky, in action. Among the numbers to be played are Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a C. P. E. Bach concerto and The Flight of the Bumble Bee by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

"The greatest demonstration in the annals of the Chicago Civic Opera," declare critics following the debut of Toti Dal Monte, Italian coloratura soprano, in Lucia in Chicago. Signorina Day Monte will sing in Elmwood Music hall on Thanksgiving night, when she will be introduced here by the Buffalo Musical Foundation. This will be her second concert appearance in America. "All agree that Dal Monte is the greatest coloratura of this age," her New York manager, Charles L. Wagner wires the Musical Foundation office, No. 32 Court street.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
NOV 1 2 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEAT SALE UNUSUALLY BRISK THIS YEAR

Seat sale for Boston Symphony orchestra concert tomorrow evening now on at Denton, Cottier & Daniels' box office has been unexceptionally brisk, Miss Bessie Ballanca, local manager of the concert, announced. Many music lovers are curious to see the new Russian conductor, Kousevitzky, in action.

Among the numbers that will be given are Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a Bach concerto and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 1 2 1924

SEAT SALE OPENED FOR TWO CONCERTS

Today at Denton, Cottier & Daniels the seat sale for the Buffalo Sympathy orchestra group of concerts for the season of 1924-25 will open. The first concert takes place this Sunday afternoon. Tickets for the group of five may be bought as well as single tickets for this Sunday's concert.

Seat sale for the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening is now open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Miss Bessie Bellanca is local manager of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 1 2 1924

WHY ORCHESTRA GAVE AMERICA'S ANTHEM

The synopsis, accompanying last evening's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert proved invaluable to many of the patrons, but it did not refer to the single unannounced number, the "Star Spangled Banner," and thereby hangs this little tale.

It occurred to the management of the concert Monday that, Tuesday being Armistice Day, it would be well to recognize the significance of the occasion in some manner, and the idea flashed that possible Koussevitzky could play America's national anthem. The idea was dismissed almost as quickly as it occurred. Had not a former conductor, Karl Muck, refused point blank to play the anthem, preferring enforced exile? Nor would a Russian conductor have the scores with him—at least it was not likely.

But an emissary to the concert at Schenectady broached the matter to Koussevitzky, and the conductor stated at once he would be delighted if he had the score. It also happened that G. E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, a Harvard man and an American, had thoughtfully put in the score. The matter was settled in a moment.

Then came the belated realization that the Chromatic Society must do something, and the fittingly draped colors on the wall of the stage was the result.

The presentation was dramatic in the extreme. The acknowledging bow of the director was intensely formal, almost cool. Then he turned, raised his baton, and the orchestra stood erect with instruments ready. At his signal the first notes of "The Star Spangled Banner" were recognized, and the audience arose en masse and listened to perhaps the most impressive rendition of America's anthem ever heard in Troy.

The incident was so unexpected, so dramatically and perfectly accomplished and so well received that it afforded an unusually happy feature of a concert par excellence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 1 2 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra! What a magnificent and brilliant opening the Chromatic Club provided for Troy's music loving public, the only blemish on the triumph being the absence of David Cowee, Jr., who always worked untiringly for the success of the Chromatic's concerts and who was instrumental in engaging the artists for this season. The audience last night more than filled the seats in the hall, occupied standing room downstairs and in the balcony and gave a warm reception to this new Russian conductor.

It has often been said that an orchestra or symphony rises or falls with its conductor, and if that is so the Boston Symphony has once again risen to the triumphal heights it once enjoyed. Koussevitsky came to this country from Russia and was claimed to be the outstanding conductor of the Continent. The world-famed musicians now in this country were generous of their praise before his arrival here, but musicians of America were a bit skeptical. The Boston Symphony is now in its 44th season and this year will be duly recorded in musical history. Koussevitsky is a majestic figure in the music world, a figure that is justly grouped with other geniuses of today.

It matters not what his program is, although it was truly a unique and brilliant one, the audience is held spellbound by this young man, who, sometimes not moving his baton, draws from his hundred musicians the very best within them. The Bach concerto for orchestra in D major was a fine beginning for the program, followed by the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the big Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, which is one of the favorites of the Philadelphia Philharmonic. Koussevitsky reveled in the Moussorgsky number, thoroughly enjoying the spell of his native Russian music. The origin of this number is especially interesting when listening to its rendition. In the spring of 1874 an exhibition of drawings and water colors by the architect, Victor Hartmann, an intimate friend of Moussorgsky's, was held at the Academy of Fine Arts at Leningrad. Wishing to show his affection for Hartmann the composer thought he would pay him tribute by "drawing in music" the best of the sketches. These pictures, exhibited to the audience last night, visualized the soul-inspiring water colors in such glowing colors and with such a delicate brush of which Hartmann and Moussorgsky would feel justly proud.

The Brahms Symphony furnished the dramatic, big climax for an evening of perfect song. Koussevitsky and his men "came and conquered" and deserve to come again. Troy's next music event will be the Vocal Society concert Wednesday evening, November 19, assisted by the Boston String Quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
NOV 1 2 1924

MUSICAL SEASON OPENS.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, opening the season of the Chromatic Concerts, was a remarkable success. Not a seat was unoccupied and standing room was at a premium. This will be followed by other Chromatic Concerts, by the concerts of the Troy Vocal Society in its jubilee year and by other musical events of the first magnitude. Troy is a musical city and supports such events with enthusiasm. Music being an integral part of community life, it should be maintained at the present high standard in spite of the loss of some of its sturdiest exponents.

192

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
Telegraph
NOV 12 1924

Symphony Boxholders Named

Among the boxholders for the concerts to be given Friday night and Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, are: Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. Edmund W. Mudge, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. T. Raymond Evans, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland, Moorhead B. Holland, Mrs. John P. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Gerald Firth, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. Frederick W. Winter, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, James J. Turner, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Roy A. Hunt, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Charles H. Bruckman, Mrs. Edmond Englert, Mrs. R. E. Hellmund, Miss Minerva Hamilton, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. J. H. Davidson, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. J. V. Blaxter, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. E. J. House, the Misses Sawyer, Mrs. James L. Stuart, Mrs. Charles B. Horton, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Paul B. Straub, Mrs. Ernest Willetts, Mrs. John Sloan and Mrs. Wesley Jones.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
NOV 12 1924

BIG DEMAND TO SEE RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR

Seat sale for the Boston Symphony orchestral concert Thursday evening November 13, now open at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels box office, has been exceptionally brisk, Miss Bessie Bellanca, local manager of the concert announced. Many local music lovers are curious to see the new Russian conductor, Koussevitzky, in action. His intensely individual readings of the classics, his celebrated "volcanic" temperament and his tendency to discard traditions, as for instance when he responded to persistent applause at a concert in Boston recently and gave an encore, the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony an encore had been granted, has centered the attention of the music world upon him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 12 1924

Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has been invited to conduct one of the 10 concerts to be given by the Philharmonic orchestra in Liverpool, England. Others who will direct the orchestra during the series are Weingartner, Sir Henry Wood, Sir Landon Ronald, Eugene Goessens and Granville Bantock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 13 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA COMING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 leaders, under their new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be guests in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon when they open the symphony season in Syria Mosque. Two programs will be given, opening tomorrow night with the Bach Concerto in D minor, followed by the Beethoven "Egmont Overture," Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition," and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor. The principal work for the Saturday matinee will be Mozart's Symphony in G minor. Berlioz, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakox and Scriabin also will be represented on the matinee program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
NOV 13 1924

Boston Artists Charm Audience At Bailey Hall

Symphony Orchestra Concert Real Musical Event in University Series — Serge Koussevitzky Given Merited Ovation for Exceptional Skill.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has for some years been the musical event of the season. The program given in Bailey Hall last evening, however, was doubly significant as it introduced to a local audience for the first time the orchestra's new and much-heralded conductor — Serge Koussevitzky, the intense and the dramatic. He was welcomed by an audience which filled the auditorium and which recalled the conductor repeatedly by its enthusiastic applause following the final number.

For at least three seasons past, University audiences have enjoyed the programs given by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteux. A comparison of the two famous conductors would be interesting, and the contrast between the type of program offered last evening and those of the past few years is also striking. Mr. Monteux was apparently a devoted modernist, usually bringing with him liberal offerings of Strauss, Debussy, Tschaikowsky, Ravel, etc. It may be that Mr. Koussevitzky is equally interested in the work of those composers. In other concerts he is said to have introduced novelties, but for one reason or another there were no strictly modern compositions on the program last evening.

To be sure, the pictures at Moussorgsky's exhibition, including the grotesque gnome music, the ballet of the chicks, the witch's house that went about in such a desultory way on hen's legs, and all the rest of them would easily pass for impressionist painting (or composing) if they were not assigned to the year 1874 by the program. These numbers were interesting, often mirth provoking, and clever, but for many the musical appeal of the program lay elsewhere.

Russian Conductor Versatile

The way in which the Russian conductor fits his manner to the type of music played was notable throughout the various numbers. Beginning with the delicacy of the Bach concerto, he scarcely seemed to move a muscle, simply glancing about the orchestra as the theme was taken up by the different instruments and moving his baton slightly in the passages calling for action, however, and particularly in the finale of the Moussorgsky, Mr. Koussevitzky was transformed into a being full of intense feeling. In other words, the new conductor has a fine sense of the dramatic, and that sense is balanced by an intellectual control that never allows himself or the orchestra to slip out of hand.

For many the Brahms symphony in E minor with its sustained andante and the splendid passion of the final allegro, contained the best of the evening. Certainly it was played with fervor and discrimination as well. It showed also, Mr. Koussevitzky's originality as a conductor, and for him the orchestra played with careful shading and with enthusiasm.

As an opening number the concerto in D major by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach was given. The program states that Mr. Koussevitzky heard this concerto played at a concert of the Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris, and was so pleased that he took the music, intending to make a modern orchestral arrangement himself. Finally, however, he entrusted the task to Maximilian Steinberg, who arranged the three movements for a flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings. The result seems to have been highly successful, bringing out the graceful quality of the French dance motifs, and preserving the spirit of the eighteenth century composition.

Beethoven's famous and much-played Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" completed the program, it being given after the Bach number, and nothing of the heroic beauty of the work was lost in the orchestra's interpretation last evening.

Following a long standing custom, no encores were given, but the audience refused to think of leaving until Mr. Koussevitzky had come forward several times to gather his laurels.

The concert was the first of this year's university series, and will be followed next month by the famous pianist, Moriz Rosenthal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
NOV 13 1924

OF NOTE TO MUSICIANS

Concert to be held tonight; Rachmaninoff seat sale.

Tonight at Elmwood Music hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in its annual concert in this city under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. The ensemble of 104 musicians is led this year by Serge Koussevitsky, the new Russian conductor. The programme for tonight includes the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Flight of the Bumble Bee, a Bach concerto, and compositions by Rachmaninoff and others.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

Today at Denton, Cottier & Daniels the seat sale for Sergi Rachmaninoff, the composer-pianist, will open. Rachmaninoff is well known in Buffalo, and returns on Tuesday evening, November 18th, of next week at Elmwood Music hall for his sixth concert in consecutive seasons, which feat is sufficient as recommendation to Buffalo fame for any artist.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST
NOV 13 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE TOMORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon, when they open the symphony orchestra season at Syria Mosque. Two programs will be given, opening tomorrow night with the Bach Concerto in D minor, followed by the Beethoven "Egmont Overture," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor. The principal work for the Saturday matinee will be Mozart's symphony in G minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
PENNSYLVANIA
PRESS
NOV 13 1924

Symphony Orchestra Coming.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians, under their new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be guests in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon, when they open the symphony season at Syria mosque.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WHEELING
W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER
NOV 13 1924

MUSIC LOVERS TO PITTSBURGH

APPROXIMATELY FIFTY LOCAL PEOPLE WILL ATTEND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Friday and Saturday of This Week.

Approximately 50 Wheeling people will go to Pittsburgh, Pa., this weekend to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be rendered Friday evening and Saturday afternoon in the Syria mosque. Serge Koussevitzsky will appear as the new conductor of this famous orchestra, which was conducted to almost unbelievable heights of musical success under the baton of Dr. Karl Much.

The Friday evening program will include numbers from Bach, Beethoven, Moussorgsky and Brohms, while the Saturday matinee concert will feature numbers from Mozart, Moussorgsky Rimsky, Korsacov and Scriabin.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 13 1924

Symphony Season Opens Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony orchestra, of 104 musicians, under their new leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will be welcome guests in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon, when they open the symphony season at Syria Mosque.

Two programs of unusual importance will be given, opening tomorrow night with the Bach Concerto for orchestra in D minor, followed by the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Brahm's Symphony No. 4. The principal work for the Saturday matinee will be Mozart's Symphony in G minor. Berlioz, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Scriabin also will be represented on the matinee program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
NOV 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT AT MUSIC HAI

Tonight at Elmwood Music hall t Boston Symphony orchestra will gi its annual concert here under loca management of Bessie Bellanca. Th program will include the Fifth Sym phony of Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsa koff's "The Flight of the Bumb Bee," a Bach concerto and compositions by Rachmaninoff. Ticke for the concert are on sale at De ton, Cottier & Daniels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
NOV 13 1924

Annual Concert of Boston Symphony.

Thursday night at Elmwood Music hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in its annual concert in this city under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. The ensemble of 104 musicians is led this year by Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor.

The program for tonight includes the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a C. P. E. Bach concerto, and compositions by Rachmaninoff and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Boston Symphony orchestra presented what is probably the finest musical concert program that has ever been heard in Buffalo at Elmwood Music hall last night. It was a wonderful program plus a world famous orchestra, under a renowned director, Serge Koussevitzky, famous in Russia, proved himself a musician of rare musicianship and individual style.

The program included a concerto in D major for orchestra by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg; Weber's overture to Oberon; a Russian group comprised of Vocalise, by Rachmaninoff; Dubinouchka, Rimsky-Korsakoff; prelude to the opera Khovantchina, Moussorgsky and a sherzo, The Flight of the Bumble Bee from the opera, Tsar Saltan, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Beethoven's fifth symphony was the final number of the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT THIS EVENING

Tonight at Elmwood Music hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in its annual concert in this city under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. The great ensemble of 104 musicians are led this year by Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor.

The program for tonight includes the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a C. E. Bach concerto, and compositions by Rachmaninoff and others.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TROY, N. Y.

EVE. RECORD

Morning

NOV 13 1924

"Star Spangled Banner" by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The synopsis, accompanying Tuesday evening's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, proved invaluable to many of the patrons, but it did not refer to the single unannounced number, the "Star Spangled Banner," and thereby hangs this little tale.

It occurred to the management of the concert Monday that, Tuesday being Armistice Day, it would be well to recognize the significance of the occasion in some manner, and the idea flashed that possible Koussevitzky could play America's national anthem. The idea was dismissed almost as quickly as it occurred. Had not a former conductor, Karl Muck, refused point blank to play the anthem, preferring enforced exile? Nor would a Russian conductor have the scores with him—at least it was not likely.

But an emissary to the concert at Schenectady broached the matter to Koussevitzky, and the conductor stated at once he would be delighted if he had the score. It also happened that G. E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, a Harvard man and an American, had thoughtfully put in the score. The matter was settled in a moment.

Then came the belated realization that the Chromatic Society must do something, and the fittingly draped colors on the wall of the stage were the result.

The presentation was dramatic in the extreme. The acknowledging bow of the director was intensely formal, almost cool. Then he turned, raised his baton, and the orchestra stood erect with instruments ready. At his signal the first notes of "The Star Spangled Banner" were recognized, and the audience arose en masse and listened to perhaps the most impressive rendition of America's anthem ever heard in Troy.

The incident was so unexpected, so dramatically and perfectly accomplished and so well received that it afforded an unusually happy feature of a concert par excellence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.

NEWS

NOV 14 1924

By EDWARD DURNEY

Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished Russian conductor recently come to these shores to guide the destinies of the Boston Symphony orchestra, paid Buffalo a visit last evening with the incomparable Boston organization and gave a memorable performance before a great audience in Elmwood Music hall. Boston Symphony orchestra and general perfection have long been synonymous terms. Buffalo has been fortunate in its frequent opportunities to hear the orchestra, and under several illustrious conductors. Koussevitzky, until this season, was known in this country only by the fine reputation he had established abroad. His local debut last night followed closely his recent American debut in Boston, and the occasion bore all the outward signs of another complete triumph for this genius of the baton.

Koussevitzky could not have wished for finer material than the Boston orchestra as Pierre Monteux, noted French conductor, left it. The favored Russian might well be the envy of his profession, and the more eager has been the anticipation of his accomplishment.

The performance of last night's beautiful program was, to a great extent, in the nature of a revelation. While the orchestra was an old friend and a goodly portion of the program wholly familiar, the individuality of the interpreter sustained lively interest throughout.

Koussevitzky is a man of rare magnetism; an artist of sane methods whose undeniable originality never goes beyond the bounds of the legitimate. His conducting is emotional in the true artistic sense, and the unanimous response he secures, despite his quiet demeanor and economy of gesture, bespeaks the subtle power of the man and the musician. He is a rythmic genius, instinctively feeling the pulse of every composition he plays. The very breath of life animates his every interpretation.

A Philipp Emanuel Bach Concerto in three movements, arranged for orchestra by Steinberg, opened the program and this vital, immortal music from the pen of the third son of the great John Sebastian, was played with a spirit, freshness and rythmic certainty which clearly exhibited its matchless purity of structure, well defined the jolly mood of the first and third movements and gracefully adorned the beautiful Andante. Conductor and men were loudly acclaimed after this first number.

The familiar "Oberon" overture, Weber, was given a finely wrought performance which, in its decided contrasts and lovely effects, brought new interest to the work.

Three Russian numbers of varied spirit, each of intense musical interest and racial charm were the Rachmaninoff "Vocalise," as orchestrated by the composer; "Dubinouchka," a Rimsky-Korsakoff orchestration of a Russian folk song and the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina." The Rachmaninoff song was ravishing in its melodic richness and beautiful scoring and the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Dubinouchka" pulse stirring in its fine rythmic swing and resonant, full climaxes. The Moussorgsky number proved alluring in its novel, picturesque effects.

Followed the much-heralded "Flight of the Bee," Rimsky-Korsakoff, described in the stage direction: "Out of the sea comes a bumble-bee and flies about the swan." The number is cleverly written to imitate the sounds of the bee and its rapid successions of notes were skilfully executed by the men. The repetition of the number in Boston broke the no-encore rule of the orchestra, and Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to play it a second time last night to satisfy the applauding audience.

The Beethoven Fifth Symphony, in C minor, probably the most popular of the immortal nine, occupied the latter half of the program. It is this symphony to which Berlioz has referred as the first of Beethoven's in which the composer has given the rein to his vast imagination. Certainly the work gives expression to a wide range of emotion and in a varied scheme wholly in keeping with the methods of the great master of form. And perhaps in none of his symphonies has Beethoven exerted a more instant appeal.

Koussevitzky's reading was always authoritative and essentially vigorous, the latter quality distinguishing the Russian's conception of the work. Bold contrasts and sharply defined rhythyms characterized the performance, and in the unfoldment of the work no significant dynamic effect was neglected.

The last movement provided a triumphant finale for leader and players and, incredible though it may seem, the audience remained seated applauding and applauding again through many recalls which the conductor justly shared with his men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH

PENNSYLVANIA

PRESS

NOV 14 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians, arrived in the city this morning, and will give the opening concerts in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series at Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. This will be the first appearance here of Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor. The program for tonight:

Concerto for orchestra in D minor....C. P. E. Bach
Overture to "Egmont," op. 84....Beethoven
Pictures at an Exhibition (Arr. by M. Ravel) .....Mussorgsky
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, op. 98..Brahms
SATURDAY AFTERNOON PROGRAM:
Symphony in G minor .....Mozart
Overture "The Roman Carnival," op. 9 .....Berlioz
Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina" .....Mussorgsky
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, from the Opera "Tsar Saltan" .....Rimsky-Korsakov
The Poem of "Ecstasy," op. 54.....Scriabin

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH

PENNSYLVANIA

PRESS

NOV 14 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians, arrived in the city today, and will give the opening concerts in the Pittsburgh Orchestra association series at Syria mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. There is great interest in the first appearance here of Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor, and the following programs have strong appeal. The works to be given tonight:

Concerto for orchestra in D minor.....C. P. E. Bach
Overture to Egmont Op. 84....Beethoven
Pictures at an Exhibition (arrg. by M. Ravel) .....Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.. ..... Brahms
Saturday Afternoon.
Symphony in G minor .....Mozart
Overture, The Roman Carnival, Op. 9 ..... Berlioz
Prelude to the opera Khovantchina... ..... Moussorgsky
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, from the opera Tsar Saltan..... ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
The Poem of Ecstasy, Op. 54.....Seriabin

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO,
N. Y.

COMMERCIAL

NOV 14 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

Tonight at Elmwood Music hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in its annual concert in this city under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. The ensemble of 104 musicians are led this year by Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor. Following a recent concert of the Boston Symphony, Philip Hale wrote in the Boston "Herald," "Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. These are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless, questioning years."

SUN

Pittsburgh, Pa.

NOV 14 1924

Boston Symphony Plays Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in the city this morning and will give the opening concerts in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series at Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. It is the first appearance here of Sergi Koussevitzky, the new conductor, and the following programs have strong appeal. The works to be given tonight:

Concerto for orchestra in D minor..... C. P. E. Bach
Overture to "Egmont" Op. 84 .....Beethoven
Pictures at an Exhibition (Arrg. by M. Ravel ..... Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98..Brahms
Saturday afternoon:
Symphony in G minor .....Mozart
Overture "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9 ..... Berlioz
Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina..... ..... Moussargsky
The Flight of the Bumble Bee—from the Opera "Tsar Saltan" .....Rimsky-Korsakov
The Poem of "Ecstasy," Op. 54 .....Scriabin

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO,
N. Y.

COMMERCIAL

NOV 15 1924

Boston Symphony Concert

By W. K. BRANG

It is to be regretted that written words are inadequate to convey even a modicum of the splendor of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, presiding like a demi-god over a miniature universe of musicians, wove divine harmonies with thundering chords and diabolical dissonances that would have enmeshed even a gargoyle's heart. Pertectly under his control, the orchestra responded to the smallest movement of his hand with a swing in the bass that made the blood surge, and a sweep in the treble that seemed like nothing so much as a rush of wind on a mountain top.

The concert opened with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D Major. Imagine a Rembrandt picture transposed into music!—orchestral coloring as contrasted to that master's light and shade—golden fugue-like themes upon a background of mysterious umber-toned bass! The familiar Oberon Overture by Weber also was impressive.

In a group of Russian compositions the wealth of tonalities at the conductor's command was fully displayed. Rachmaninov's pathetic Vocalise and Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera Khovantchina profoundly stirred the emotions, only to be swept away again with the first smashing bars of Rimsky-Korsakov's folk song, Dubinouchka. It conjured up pictures of infernal majesty. Ponderous barges hauled by toil-torn men through murky water; famine ravished peasants feverishly dancing a Czarda of death while a ghoulish Fate looks on. In contrast to the grimness of these pictures was the same composer's Flight of the Bumble Bee, a work which seems to mark the limits of imitative music.

But all the foregoing music, beautiful though it may be, fades before the heaven-stirring Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The marvelous interpretation of this work by Koussevitzky seems to us a fit offering at the shrine of the Master. Any words of ours in appreciation of the symphony as rendered last night are worse than futile. A symphony which epitomizes the mingled suffering and happiness, shame and glory, the meannesses and greatness of the human race, is not to be admired but with intense emotion. The greatest tribute that could have been paid to a work which has no counterpart on earth, would have been silence.

Instead there was thundering applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y. 173

EXPRESS

NOV 15 1924

CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By MARY M. HOWARD.

The combination of one of the world's greatest orchestras, a new and renowned conductor, and a programme of rare novelty made the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra heard last evening in Elmwood Music hall an outstanding one among the many fine concerts this organization has given in Buffalo. It introduced Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian who, in the few weeks he has been in this country, has already proved himself a master of his craft, a conductor of ripe musicianship and individual style. Mr. Koussevitzky has a magnetic personality which impresses his players and public alike. He conducts quietly, but one feels the intensity and fire underneath his dignified exterior and his incisive, stimulating leadership is felt by those whom he leads and no less by those who listen.

The programme in itself was enough to arouse keen interest from the start. It began with a concerto in D major for orchestra by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg, a pupil and the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The work is charmingly scored for flute, two oboes, bassoon, horn and strings preserving some of the delicate tenuity and the quaint simplicity of the music. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out its polyphony with beautiful clarity, and read its measures with fine exactitude and unswerving steadiness. It was an artistically conceived and admirably wrought performance, which brought spontaneous applause from the large audience.

Weber's overture to Oberon was given with such surprising variety of expression, shading from the exquisite pianissimo of the horn phrase at the beginning to the jubilant outbursts of the Rezia aria, as to arouse unrestrained enthusiasm. The conductor played upon his orchestra as if it were a solo instrument, taking bold, but effective liberties with the time, and the men responded to his changing tempos as one man.

Most interesting in content and performance was the Russian group, which comprised Vocalise, by Rachmaninoff; Dubinouchka, Rimsky-Korsakoff; prelude to the opera Khovantchina, Moussorgsky and a scherzo, The Flight of the Bumble Bee, from the opera, Tsar Saltan, Rimsky-Korsakoff. The Vocalise, a wordless song, was given in Buffalo two seasons ago by Nina Koschetz, with orchestra. It is far more effective, however, in its orchestral garb, for no human voice can sing its song of infinite yearning with the myriad iridescent colors of the orchestra. Dubinouchka is a variant of the Volga Boatmen's song. It is typically racial in its wildness and barbaric sweep, which almost carries the listener off his feet. The Moussorgsky prelude, a tone painting of the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow, is subtly suggestive, with its quiet, glowing harmonies, punctuated here and there by the bell tones which ring for early matins. So pleasing did the Rimsky-Korsakoff Scherzo prove that the audience insisted upon a repetition. It is a trifle in substance and duration, but it taxes the virtuosity of the players, who rose to the occasion amazingly, and deservedly shared in the honors accorded to the conductor.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was the final number of the evening. It received a conventional reading, with especial sensuous loveliness of tone displayed in the playing of the Andante. The work, as a whole, was the least interesting number of the evening. It was slightly turbid, here and there, and the intonation was not always flawless, but perhaps its defects were more apparent in contrast with the rarely beautiful achievements of the orchestra in all that preceded the symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled many times at the close of the evening and again made his players rise to ackowledge their share of the applause.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From JOURNAL, NOV 14 1924
Chicago, Ill.

Moussorgsky, composer of "Boris Godunoff," wrote for the piano only seldom, but his "Pictures at an Exhibition" have interested both pianists and arrangers. Touschmaloff's orchestration of them was made known to Chicagoans five years ago by the Chicago Symphony orchestra. Ravel has also given them orchestral dress, and in this form they were played by the Boston Symphony orchestra recently, for the first time in America. Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor.

E. S.

194

transcript
Nov 15

The Mask of Italy

Dusolina Giannini

Newly Risen Singer, Soon to Be Heard in Boston for the First Time

THIS CLIPPING FROM

FARGO, N. D.
FORUM

NOV 15 1924

An Amusing Controversy

The Springfield Union.

It was an amusing verbal battle that was recently fought through the foyers of Boston's Symphony hall. The Boston Symphony orchestra a short time ago opened its season under the baton of M. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian. Not the least of the attractions of a concert by this organization is the program book, for a long time and probably still notably edited by Philip Hale. Much was expected of the new conductor, and, although his interpretations are variously received, his ability as a musician is undenied. Whatever controversies he provoked only added spirit and enthusiasm to polite musical conversation. But the program books aroused a veritable storm.

What had been done? The editor had not violated approved musical canons, nor misplaced his dates, nor confused his themes. He had simply followed the instructions of the postoffice department and had denominated the capital of soviet Russia as Leningrad. To the conservative minded of Beacon Hill and State street this was more than a faux pas, it was an outright insult to American traditions, and the objectors, in the usual manner, traced the subordination to Moscow, or, what seemed to them the same thing, to M. Koussevitzky. But M. Koussevitzky retaliated by saying what is probably the truth, that he, together with numerous other intelligent and cultured Russians, has nothing but enmity for the soviet, which has deprived him of his home, his small wealth, and partially of his freedom. Forthwith the red hunting abated, but the program books have now reverted to the older form, St. Petersburg. Even Petrograd, the name adopted by the czar during the war, was foregone in the effort to achieve complete stability.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
NOV 15 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 15 1924

Symphony Orchestra At Mosque Pleases

New Boston Conductor Gives Fine Instrumentation.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with its new coductor, Serge Koussevitzky, opened the orchestral season last night at the Mosque with sincere and sustained applause. The huge auditorium was well filled.

Koussevitzky has precision and a directness that make for immediate results. He has a curious way of starting the tempo and then stopping or picking it up with the beat. He impressed as an intellectual conductor rather than as an impulsive one.

For an opening work the little known Bach Concerto in D major was used. It was singularly chaste and clean. The opening movement contained many fine solo violin passages. The second was a charming song sung by the strings with here and there a high relief in the wood-winds. The finale was notable for its delicacy.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture impressed some in the house for its overblown brasses. In the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" there were 11 pittoresque episodes. The "Promenade" in five-four time was well played. In the "Gnomus" was beheld the touch of the arranger Ravel. The "Ballet of the Chickens" had many interesting bits of instrumentation. The "Gates of the Bohatyrs" with its broad chorale for brasses and promenade theme for a coda, was a stirring climax.

The symphony chosen was the magnificent Brahms No. 4 in E minor. In the "Allegro" there were many delightful passages for the wood-winds and if the horns and brass choir were tortured in the first numbers, in the symphony they were entirely satisfactory. The "Andante moderato" with its cello and viola song was a movement most like to remember. In the third movement there were many nicely wrought scales for the flutes and the "Allegro energico" was done in a forceful manner. The finale was a noble closing worthy of Brahms.

MARGUERITE D'ALVAREZ, (CONTRALTO SOLOIST) "with Boston Symphony's first Concert of the Season" INFANTRY HALL, NEXT TUES. EVE

ALDERMAN JOHN
ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 15 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

EXTRA SYMPHONIES

The series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given on Dec 1, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 30 and April 27.

The soloists will be Dusolina Gianinni, soprano; Myra Hess, piano; Mieczyslaw Munz, piano; Richard Burgin, violin; John Charles Thomas, baritone.

Only about 100 season tickets remain unsold, and since these are likely all to be sold in a few days, there will be no tickets available for these concerts singly.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY DECIDES N. Y. PROGRAMS

New Boston Conductor to Play Much Russian Music—Next Week's Concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra, whose programmes and the way he plays them have apparently rejuvenated things over in the Hub's Symphony Hall, has now announced the substance of his first pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on November 27 and 29.

In spite of the fact that Walter Damrosch has toot-tooted Arthur Honegger's locomotive symphonies, "Pacific 231," all over the town, Mr. Koussevitzky will show how he plays it at the Thursday evening programme. Besides that, there will be a Vivaldi concerto for orchestra, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

The Saturday afternoon programme will consist of first local performances of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bee," from his "Tsar Saltan," and of Serge Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite. Otherwise there is to be the overture to Glinka's "Rouslan and Ludmilla," the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" and Brahms's Fourth Sym-

Camb. Sentinel
Nov 15

THE CULTURAL TRINITY

Most Cambridge people know about the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its preeminency in American music, but not so many realize that (apart from its famous band, at present playing at its amplest stride, under the magnetic sway of the Russian Koussevitzky) Symphony Hall is the place where other forms of music and kindred arts are presented under an infinite variety of forms. Rarely is Symphony Hall dark on an evening. It is John McCormack one night, Josef Hofmann on a Sunday afternoon, Karsavina, the peer of Pavlowa in the many dance rhythms that came out of Russia, that land of myriad talents. Then a Kreisler, a Rachmaninoff, a De Reszke quartette, or Roland Hayes will grace the gray stage—all the great musical talents that adorn the world, when they come to Boston, gravitate to Symphony Hall.

It provides wide opportunity (and herein Cambridge may take note) to keep in close touch with the world's culture in music and the arts. Its atmosphere is cordial, attentive and serene, finding perfect expression in the personality and manners of Manager W. H. Brennan, his assistant, Geo. E. Judd, and a staff that has caught the happy contagion from its superiors in blending service with courtesy and briskness of motion with an amiable address.

Culture and Cambridge are supposedly one, and as the two universities express high thinking, if not necessarily plain living, Symphony Hall, just over the Charles, rounds out the trinity.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow evening comes the first of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts at Symphony Hall. Wisely Mr. Koussevitzky has placed upon this first programme pieces in which he and the orchestra have already been acclaimed here: Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the suite from deFalla's "Love the Sorcerer," Honegger's sensational "Pacific 231," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. As assisting singer Dusolina Giannini, making her first appearance in Boston, will be heard in an air from "Oberon."

* * * *

The programme of the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, commented upon above, comprises Locatelli's "Funeral Symphony," Faure's Overture to "Penelope" and his elegy for violoncello and orchestra (Jean Bedetti, soloist), Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," and Scriabin's Third Symphony, the "Divine Poem."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 15 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY COMING HERE TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall there will be an event of particular importance in the debut here of Serge Koussevitzky, the remarkable new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition to this there will be the innovation of a striking novelty in the "Pacific 231" the characterization of an American locomotive in action by Honegger, the radical Parisian composer. The music describes the great mechanism cumberously getting into its pace, hurrying through the night and ultimately attaining a certain tranquility of steady motion.

"The Flight of the Bumble Bee" is a little Scherzo from Rimsky-

ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 15 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

Program for Sixth Symphony

The following program will be performed at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major; Debussy's suite "La Mer"; Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead," and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Korsakov's fairy opera Tsar Saltan in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. The charm of this tiny piece is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston, an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the first beginnings of the orchestra, 40 years ago

American
Nov 15

MONDAY CONCERTS

The series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given on: December 1, January 12 February 9, March 30 and April 27.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following program will be performed at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Mozart's Overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's Symphony in C major; Debussy's Suite "La Mer"; Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead;" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Herald
Nov 15

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE

Apropos of the repetition of "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" at a recent Symphony concert. Some say that "The Funeral March of a Marionette" was repeated at a concert led by Mr. Henschel. One correspondent writes that Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" was repeated early in the history of the Symphony orchestra. We have not found any proof of the two statements in the contemporary newspaper reviews.

But there was a repetition on March 8, 1884. At that concert a scherzo by Mr. Chadwick pleased the audience so much that a repetition was demanded and granted. This scherzo was afterward incorporated in his symphony in B flat. We believe that this was the first repetition in many years.

As

Traveler
Nov 15

Program for Sixth Symphony

The following program will be performed at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major; Debussy's suite "La Mer"; Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead," and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
TELEGRAM
NOV 16 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 16 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its Season Here Next Tuesday with Its New Conductor Koussevitzky. — Week's Recitals and Other Coming Events.

Not only because of the debut here of Mr. Koussevitsky but for the programme there is unusual interest and anticipation in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall.

The orchestra is now on its first journeyings outside Boston, having visited New York State and Pittsburgh last week, and this week makes its first appearance under the new conductor in New York city. The interest has been so lively there that for the first time since the regime of Dr. Muck, it is said, the series has been sold out.

Announcements of church musical programmes or other events of general musical interest intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to Music Editor. The Sunday Journal, and should reach this office before Friday noon.

Alfred C. Bertolini

New conductor of Providence Post American Legion Band

Marguerite D'Alvarez

Contralto Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Tuesday

Marguerite d'Alvarez is to be the soloist at the concert here, and will sing the Agnus Dei from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne Suite." She is a native of Peru, and first came to note in this country as leading contralto of Hammerstein's Manhattan Grand Opera Company. She also sang with the Boston Opera Company and Fifth, and, as has been announced, has appeared in the principal opera houses on the Continent.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Honegger's "Pacific 231," Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Kovantchina," and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture are the other numbers.

Of the music to be performed by the orchestra here, the Providence Public Library has the miniature score of the "Roman Carnival" and the "L'Arlesienne Suite," arranged for piano, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony arranged in miniature score, conductor's score and for piano solo and piano duet. The score of Honegger's "Pacific 231" is not to be obtained, Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" have been ordered.

All of the music has been placed on a table in the Music Library, and the programme of the concert is posted on the bulletin board in that department. In addition, newspaper clippings and the recent copies of Musical America, Musical Courier and Musical Digest, which contain accounts of the performance of "Pacific 231" and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by the orchestra in Symphony Hall have been placed on the table. The library has on file the programmes of

Marcel Dupre

French organist gives recital at Sayles Hall next Saturday night in observance of Edgar J. Lownes "Memory Day."

YES, it is meant to typify a western railroad locomotive—Pacific 231. And the strange part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Groupe des Six . . numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony introduced Pacific 231 to the world . . . on May 8 last in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

—2ND AD METROPOLITAN

Pacific 231 can not be classified with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element; and since Honegger (a Swiss, born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to depict through the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace over the ra' It is freak music which will side as the power does "dead" engine.

Dec. 31—Operalogue, "Les Huguenots," 601 Elmwood avenue, 8.

the concerts by the orchestra in Boston as well as in this city.

* * *

This morning's programme at St. Ste-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 16 1924

Concerts in Brooklyn

Hofmann To-morrow; Boston Symphony November 28

Josef Hofmann will give his only Brooklyn recital of the season to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, with a program including numbers of Chopin, Beethoven, Schumann, Rachmaninoff Schubert-Godowsky, Albeniz-Godowski and a final number by Mr. Hofmann himself.

On Friday evening, November 28, Serge Koussevitzky will make his first Brooklyn appearance at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, giving Vivaldi's concerto in D for orchestra, edited by Siloti; Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes"; Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Reinald Werrenrath will give his only Brooklyn recital of the season at the Academy on Monday evening, December 1, and William Gustaffson, Metropolitan basso, will appear at the Academy on December 8.

Globe
Nov 16

...the Madonna," ...; "Laudate Dominum," Con-...se.

...riday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra, sixth program: Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Symphony in C, Boccherini; "The Sea," Debussy; "Totenninsel," Rachmaninoff; "Till Euelenspiegel," Strauss. There is no soloist.

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen a peculiarly exacting piece to open his program this week, the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The novelty is an 18th century symphony by Boccherini

Post
Nov 16

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Since Mr. Rachmaninoff will be in Boston this week Mr. Koussevitzky has fittingly placed upon the programme of this, the sixth pair of Symphony concerts, his distinguished fellow-countryman's tone-poem, "The Island of the Dead," after the picture of Arnold Boecklin. With the omission of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," the programme ...wise stands as previously announced: Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, Opus 18, No. 3; Debussy's symphonic sketches, "The Sea"; and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 16 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAM.

Serge Koussevitzky will make his debut in Brooklyn at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here, as its new head, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 28. The Russian conductor announces the following program for this occasion:

Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Nuage & Fetes;" Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy;" and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

196

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 16 1924

Prov. Journal Nov 16

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its Season Here Next Tuesday with Its New Conductor Koussevitzky. — Week's Recitals and Other Coming Events.

Not only because of the debut here of Mr. Koussevitsky but for the programme there is unusual interest and anticipation in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall.

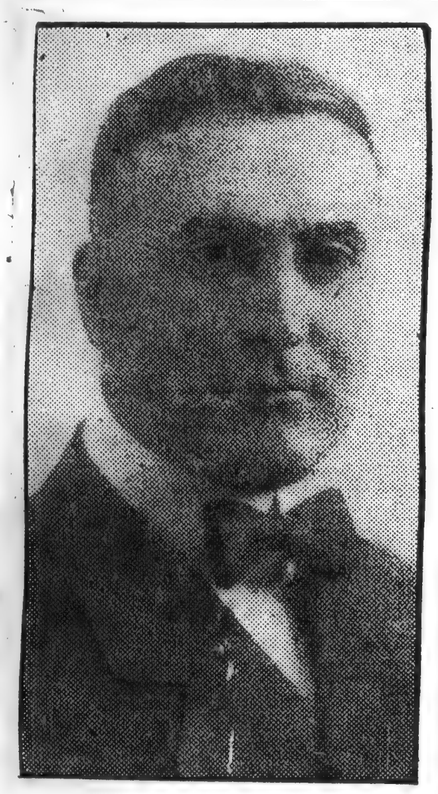
The orchestra is now on its first journeyings outside Boston, having visited New York State and Pittsburgh last week, and this week makes its first appearance under the new conductor in New York city. The interest has been so lively there that for the first time since the regime of Dr. Muck, it is said, the series has been sold out.

Marguerite d'Alvarez is to be the soloist at the concert here, and will sing the Agnus Dei from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne Suite." She is a native of Peru, and first came to note in this country as leading contralto of Hammerstein's Manhattan Grand Opera Company. She also sang with the Boston Opera Company and Fifth, and, as has been announced, has appeared in the principal opera houses on the Continent.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Honegger's "Pacific 231," Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Kovantchina," and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture are the other numbers.

Of the music to be performed by the orchestra here, the Providence Public Library has the miniature score of the "Roman Carnival" and the "L'Arlesienne Suite," arranged for piano, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony arranged in miniature score, conductor's score and for piano solo and piano duet. The score of Honegger's "Pacific 231" is not to be obtained, Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" have been ordered.

All of the music has been placed on a table in the Music Library, and the programme of the concert is posted on the bulletin board in that department. In addition, newspaper clippings and the recent copies of Musical America, Musical Courier and Musical Digest, which contain accounts of the performance of "Pacific 231" and "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," by the orchestra in Symphony Hall have been placed on the table. The library has on file the programmes of



Alfred C. Bertolini
New conductor of Providence Post American Legion Band

Announcements of church musical programmes or other events of general musical interest intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to Music Editor. The Sunday Journal, and should reach this office before Friday noon.

Marguerite D'Alvarez
Contralto Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Tuesday

An unusual program and a remarkable conductor will lend interest to the first Boston Symphony concert of the season here which will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, who has come to the orchestra this season, introduced Honegger's score, "Pacific 231," describing an American locomotive to Europe last spring, and to America this autumn. This music in which a Parisian radical describes a phenomenon of our own civilization has created a great deal of interest in this country, and been performed already in New York, Chicago and elsewhere.

Another interesting piece will be the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," a little Scherzo from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera, Tsar Saltan, in which a prince transforms himself into a bee for his own purposes. The charm of this tiny piece is evident from the fact that when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it in Boston, an encore was demanded and granted for the first time since the first beginnings of the orchestra, 40 years ago.

Mr. Koussevitzky will also perform Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture; Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-minor. This was the first classical symphony and the first music of Beethoven to be performed by him in America when he interpreted this score at the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on Oct. 17 and 18. There was considerable curious anticipation of the event since word had come from Europe that this conductor was capable of interpreting classical symphonies very much in his own way, causing angry protest from certain conservatives and worshippers of tradition. Of course, such were present in the Boston audiences of the concerts mentioned, but not a murmur was raised except in enthusiasm of this great conductor's eloquence in the immortal Fifth Symphony.

The soloist will be Mme. d'Alvarez, the famous Peruvian contralto. She will be heard in the Agnus Dei from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne Suite."

MARGUERITE d'ALVAREZ

Contralto Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Opens Its Season Here Next Tuesday Evening at Infantry Hall.

Prov. Journal Nov 16

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY SERIES

The series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will be given on Dec. 1, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 30, April 27. The soloists will be: Dusolina Gianinni, soprano; Myra Hess, piano; Mieczyslaw Munz, piano; Richard Burgin, violin; John Charles Thomas, baritone. Only about 100 season tickets remain unsold and, since they are likely all to be sold in a few days, there will be no tickets available for these concerts singly.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM FOR NEXT CONCERT

The following program has been prepared for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Mozart's overture to "Marriag of Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major; Debussy's suite "La Mer"; Rachmaninov's "The Isle of the Dead" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 16 1924

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Since Mr. Rachmaninoff will be in Boston this week Mr. Koussevitzky has fittingly placed upon the programme of this, the sixth pair of Symphony concerts, his distinguished fellow-countryman's tone-poem, "The Island of the Dead," after the picture of Arnold Boecklin. With the omission of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," the programme otherwise stands as previously announced: Mozart's overture to "Figaro"; Boccherini's symphony in C major, Opus 18, No. 3; Debussy's symphonic sketches, "The Sea"; and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 16 1924

A course of twenty lectures "to aid in appreciation of the Boston symphony concerts" will be given as a special feature of the Massachusetts Division of University Extension, acting jointly with the Boston Public Library.

Koussevitzky Prepares Attractive Programme to Open Local Boston Symphony Series

Written for the Sunday Journal
By WARREN STOREY SMITH

Exceeding any interest in the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will be the curiosity and the excitement over the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

No other conductor of the Boston Symphony, it is safe to say, has come to America with so brilliant a European reputation. Of late years the "Concerts Koussevitzky" have been the orchestral sensations of Paris, and the conductor's triumphs in London, Berlin, Paris, Madrid and many other capitals of music have been no less complete. And this year for the first time America, too, may know his achievements.

Born in Tver, in northern Russia, in 1878, Serge Koussevitzky became at the age of 12 the conductor of the orchestra of the town's theatre and the composer of incidental music for the plays presented. At 14 he was enrolled as a pupil at the Moscow Conservatory, where his instrument was the double-bass and the celebrated Rambaussec was his teacher. In due time he was appointed double-bass soloist at the Imperial Opera, and as the greatest living virtuoso of that bulky instrument he toured Russia and western Europe for 10 years.

But conducting, not performing, was Koussevitzky's great passion, and after a romantic marriage, which brought him financial independence, he organized in Moscow an orchestra, with which annually during the summer months he made voyages down the River Volga, carrying orchestral music to the remoter regions of his country.

The Russian revolution brought Koussevitzky the post of Director of the State Orchestras, but the hardships of existence in Soviet Russia in time induced him to seek voluntary exile, to the gain of Europe and now of America.

As five concerts in Boston have disclosed his traits and his abilities, Mr. Koussevitzky is a leader of extraordinary magnetism and rare temperamental warmth, whose control over himself and his band is absolute. Furthermore, his knowledge of scores old and new is as thorough as it is extensive; to the minutest detail he knows the effects that he desires and unfailingly he achieves them.

A musician of the broadest sympathies and a man of clear intellectual force, Mr. Koussevitzky seemingly excels as interpreter of music of every age and school. Beneath his baton the classics assume a new eloquence—and this despite his reputed predilection for the music of modern and ultra-modern composers.

On Mr. Koussevitzky's first programme for the Providence concerts stand pieces of which his performances have brought him especial acclaim in Boston. Though a few have resented his "liberties" with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, it is the widespread opinion that [illegible] his effort to reveal in the music the [illegible]emental passions, conflicts and triu[illegible] of Beethoven's imaginings, he [illegible]n extraordinary degree released, exalted and intensified this masterpiece among masterpieces.

Of the shorter pieces that make this programme the most sensational and most surprising, if not musically the most important, is Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231," a tonal poem in praise of a modern locomotive. First played by Mr. Koussevitzky in Paris last season, "Pacific 231" immediately took its place as one of the most individual and arresting of contemporary compositions. To be sure, superficial or unfriendly criticism dismisses the piece as an "amusing" or an "impertinent" bit of musical realism. But the more sympathetic listener feels in [illegible] Honegger's avowed intent to give expression to the emotions aroused in him by [illegible] locomotive, the "pathos," to use his own word, of the steel monster hurtling through the darkness.

It is natural enough that Mr. Koussevitzky should have a peculiar sympathy for the music of his own countryme[illegible] and the two Russian pieces that make the rest of this programme, together with Berlioz's brilliant "Roman Carnival" Overture and the "Agnus Dei" made from Bizet's incidental music to "L'Arlesienne," to be sung by Marguerite d'Alvarez, were received with delight at their Boston premieres. One of them, in fact, the tiny Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumblebee," from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera of Russian legend, "Tsar Saltan," was repeated at the Saturday evening concert, a departure from rule and custom that set tongues to wagging and typewriters to clicking for days to follow.

A singularly attractive bit of tone-picturing is this Scherzo, yet it has hardly the musical interest of the other Russian fragment to be played, the Prelude to Musorgsky's posthumous opera, "Khovantchina." Given an exquisite orchestral setting by Rimsky-Korsakov, to whom fell the task of completing Musorgsky's opera, this prelude admirably fulfills its musical and dramatic mission in conjuring up a vision of sunrise over the Red Square of the Kremlin at Moscow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES
CALIFORNIA
CALIFORNIA TIMES
NOV 16 1924

PACIFIC 231

Yes, it is meant to typify a western railroad locomotive — Pacific 231. And the strange part of it all is that it is the title of a composition for orchestra written by Arthur Honegger, one of the Groupe des Six. . . . numbering half a dozen composers who make Paris their home and the writing of queer music their vocation.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, introduced Pacific 231 to the world . . . . on May 8, last, in the French capital. Walter Damrosch selected the work as one bound to attract attention at the first 1924-1925 concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which turned out to be the case.

Pacific 231 cannot be classified with music as we understand it. The descriptive element is the prime element, and since Honegger (a Swiss, born in Havre) is happiest, apparently, in penning odd intervals and inharmonic sounds this orchestral piece is nothing more than an effort to depict through the aid of an orchestra the composer's love of a locomotive. You hear the hissing of escaping steam, the gathering headway of the monster machine, and its surging at a furious pace over the rails. It is freak music which will subside as the power goes from a "dead" engine.

197

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 16 1924

Koussevitzky Announces First Programs for Carnegie Hall

Serge Koussevitzky, making his first New York visit at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play the following programs at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week, November 27 and 29. His Thanksgiving Day program will be:

Concerto for orchestra in D minor (arr. Silotl) ..... Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Nocturnes: Nuages, Fetes..... Debussy
Pacific 231..... Honegger
Poeme de l'Extase..... Scriabin

The program for Saturday afternoon, November 29, will be:

Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" Glinka
Prelude to "Khovamtchina"...Moussorgsky
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, from "Tsar Saltan"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Scythian Suite (first New York performance) ..... Prokofieff
Smyphony No. 4, in E minor..... Brahms

The Philadelphia Orchestra will also introduce a novelty at its third concert of the season on Tuesday evening Paul Hindemith's "Nusch-Nuschi" dances. The symphony on Leopold Stokowski's program will be Beethoven's Fourth.

The Philharmonic will play three times this week, opening its Carnegie Hall Sunday afternoon series to-day, with Sigismond Stojowski as soloist in his own piano concerto, and the Philharmonic's first performance of the Pathetic Symphony. On Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Mr. Van Hoogstraten will play a comparatively unfamiliar symphony by Dvorak, the Second, in D minor. Recently the familiar "New World" has been the only symphony of Dvorak played here. The Second Symphony was first played in America by the Philharmonic in 1886, under the leadership of Theodore Thomas, but is practically a novelty to most concert-goers. Brahms's Third Symphony will be the principal number in the Philharmonic's program for next Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will give its second pair of Carnegie Hall concerts this Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, with Albert Spalding and Paul Kochanski as soloists in the Bach double violin concerto. The symphony will be the third of Brahms. On Saturday afternoon the New York Symphony will give his second Brooklyn concert of the season, with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Saint-Saëns's septet for trumpet, piano and strings, with Vladimir Drucker as solo trumpeter and Mr. Damrosch at the piano. Honegger's "Pacific 231" will have its first Brooklyn performance. The third Aeolian Hall concert, next Sunday afternoon, will have Renée Chemet as soloist in Lalo's F minor violin concerto, the "Jupiter" symphony and the Saint-Saëns septet, with the same soloists as in Brooklyn, Lazare Saminsky will conduct the final scene from his ballet, "Lament of Rachel."

The second Saturday morning concert for children will be given at Carnegie Hall on November 29, with a program of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, the andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, march from Raff's "Lenore" symphony, and three dances from Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite.

Musical Instruction

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 16 1924

Serge Koussevitzky will make his debut in Brooklyn at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here, as its new conductor, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 28. The Russian announces the following program for this occasion:

Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuage and Fetes"; Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 16 1924

At the Koussevitzky concert on Nov 28 there will be played: Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra in D minor (edited by Silotl), Weber's "Oberon" overture. Debussy's Nocturnes "Nuages et Fetes," Hongnegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstacy."

Advertiser
Nov 16

SYMPHONY PROGRAM
Boccerini's C major symphony will have its first American performances at this week's Symphony concerts, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The program also comprises Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, the Debussy tone pictures known as "The Sea," Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead" and one of Richarde Strauss' tone poems, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Monday Symphony concerts will be given on December 1, January 12, February 9, March 30, April 27. The soloists will be Dusolina Giannini, soprano; Myra Hess and Mieczyslaw Munz, pianists; Richard Burgin, violin; John Charles Thomas, baritone.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 16 1924

No one to our knowledge has complained of the absence of soloists at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Koussevitzky as soloist, seems to answer the purpose.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 17 1924

Transcript
Nov 17

THE CONCERT-HALL: WEEK-END HARVEST FRESHLY WINNOWED

THROUGH OTHER CITIES PASSES MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The Journey to New York at Hand—The De Reszke Singers for New Venture and New Experience—Mr. Mason Leads the People's Orchestra—Mrs. Hudson-Alexander in Annual Return—Enter Dusolina Giannini

FROM a first expedition to cities beyond the Bostonian horizon Mr. Koussevitzky has returned well pleased. Schenectady, Troy, Ithaca, Buffalo and Pittsburgh—twice over—all heard him last week; heaped him with applause; yielded audiences with an ear as well for music. He has known the luxury of travel by private car; discovered that an armory may house a concert without too grave handicap; come face to face with the public of secondary American cities and university towns, craving a symphony concert as often as it comes their way. To this public he adjusted programs skilfully. Upon each stood a classic symphony—Beethoven's Fifth; Brahms's Fourth; Mozart's in G minor. Upon each was a classic overture—to "Oberon"; to "Egmont"; or else "The Roman Carnival." Into "modernism" Mr. Koussevitzky ventured no further than the moderate distance along which Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" or Ravel's version of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" might bear his hearers. Among the ancients he lingered only over Emmanuel Bach's resonant and flowing Concerto. He entertained Schenectady and Buffalo with Russian trifles like the "Scherzo of the Bee" and Rimsky-Korsakov's arrangement of the folk-tune, "Dubinouchka." The other audiences, seemingly, he accounted above such toying. Yet none the less he pleased them.

After a week in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky goes forth anew—this time to the conquest of New York, vital victory for any European conductor in America. His fortunes there rather than in any other American city, will be reported overseas. If he carries the day, then will the Boston Orchestra be on the way to regain its old place in our capital of music. At the least an eager public awaits him, since it has already taken nearly every seat in Carnegie Hall for the two concerts. At the first, on Thursday evening, Nov. 27, Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra through these pieces:

Concerto for Orchestra in D minor..... Vivaldi
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon"..... Weber
Two Nocturnes ("Clouds; Fetes")..... Debussy
Orchestral Movement, "Pacific 231"... Honegger
"Poem of Ecstacy"..... Skriabin

Having thus set in view his powers as conductor through a miscellaneous program, Mr. Koussevitzky will divide his second concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 29, between the Russians and Brahms viz.:

Overture to the Opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantchina"... Musorgsky
Scherzo of the Bee from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Scythian Suite ..... Prokoflev
Symphony in E minor, No 4..... Brahms

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 18 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian Conductor, Newcomer in This City.

An important event in the musical annals of Providence is the first appearance in the city to-night of Serge Koussevitzky, noted Russian conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its opening concert of the season here in Infantry Hall. New York has not yet heard the Russian leader, but Boston and certain Western cities have.

A feature of to-night's concert will be "Pacific 231," a description of an American locomotive, by the Parisian composer Honnegger, which Koussevitzky introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn. Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also scheduled for the programme, is being introduced to America by this conductor. The remainder of the programme includes Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," Moussorsky's prelude to "Khovantchina," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

The soloist will be Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto, who will sing Bizet's "Agnus Dei."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 18 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY WILL BE HERE TONIGHT

Tonight probably will mark an important event in the musical annals of Providence for Serge Koussevitsky, the Rusian conductor, will be heard here for the first time when he presides over the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's opening as its new conductor.

A feature of this concert will be the "Pacific 231," a description of an American locomotive, by the Parisian composer, Honegger, which Kousevitzky introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn. Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also scheduled for this program, has also unusual descriptive qualities, and is being introduced to America by this conductor. The rest of the program will include: Berlinoz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina;" Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

The soloist will be Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto, who will be heard in the "Angus Die," Bizet.

Post
Nov 17

* * * *

I observe that the moving picture machine in Symphony Hall has been removed from its former location in the first balcony, and now occupies a permanent place in the rear of the second balcony.

In previous years many choice seats had to be sacrificed in order to install the movie booth.

This now occupies an area outside the auditorium and holes have been made in the wall to allow the rays to be projected through.

At least fifty more seats will be available because of this change, I am told.

* * * *

AT LEFT—SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who makes his Providence debut to-morrow evening.

198

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 18 1924

The Boston Symphony Season Opens To-night

To-night will probably mark an important event in the musical annals of Providence for Serge Koussevitzky, the renowned Russian conductor, will be heard here for the first time when he presides over the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's opening as its new conductor. New York has not yet heard the Russian leader but Boston and certain western cities have, and the verdict as to his pre-eminent qualities and his manifest genius is unanimous.

A feature of this concert will be the "Pacific 231," a description of an American locomotive, by the Parisian composer Honegger, which Koussevitzky introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn. Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also scheduled for this program, has also unusual descriptive qualities, and is being introduced to America by this conductor. The rest of the program will include: Berlioz's Overture "The Roman Carnival"; Moussorsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

The soloist will be Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto who will be heard in the Agnus Dei, Bizet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 19 1924

PLEASING CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Orchestra's New Conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, Impressive in His First Appearance Here.—Many Thrills Provided at Infantry Hall Recital.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening began its 44th season in Providence, playing in Infantry Hall before a capacity audience. It was an occasion of unusual interest, in that it presented for the first time here the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme, too, both in content and arrangement, held something new and stimulating. There was the Honegger orchestral movement, extremely modern, as a novelty; Russian composers were represented in colorful numbers, and, for vocal soloist, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, a newcomer. Bethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, was reserved for the closing number, an innovation in programme arrangement at these concerts.

It was a concert that brought many thrills, not only in the playing of the curious "Pacific 231," but in the breadth, sweep and power with which the masterful, energetic Russian conductor led his band of virtuosi, notably in the opening overture and the first and final movements of the symphony. Strength and tremendous nervous energy are in evidence in Koussevitsky's conducting. Somewhat demonstrative, he plainly shows his complete conception in his work. His magnetism has noticeable effect in the response of the men, who obey with splendid unanimity.

Precedent was broken in the course of the evening's programme, the time honored rule of no encores being suspended after the playing of Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a catchy bit of descriptive writing. After several recalls Koussevitsky repeated the number.

The arrangement of the programme follows:

Berlioz..Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Honegger.."Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement
Moussorgsky.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"
Bizet....."Agnus Dei," from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne"
Beethoven..Symphony No. 5 in C-minor, Op. 67
Allegro con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; Trio.
Allegro.

As he appeared at the conductor's desk, Koussevitsky received a warm greeting. He responded by giving a very effective reading of the overture. He seems literally to hold the men in his mental grasp so surely do they follow and fulfil his every indicated interpretative desire. At times during the overture one almost might see, as well as hear, Koussevitsky draw crescendos from the orchestra. The technical side of the men's work has been carefully polished under the new leader, who, apparently, is a fine drillmaster.

To many the orchestral offering awaited with greatest interest was none other than the Honegger "Pacific 231," a piece that has received considerable notice in recent musical news items. This is not strange, as the modernist is now having his day. Occasionally he amuses himself and his audiences with attempts to make musical instruments create illusions of many things which have little relationship to music. In the orchestral movement by Honegger the composer endeavors to produce a "visual impression," a "physical sensation" of a great engine. He has succeeded well, so well that the hearer is in terror of the rushing, roaring, grinding monster which discordantly hurls itself through space and momentarily seems in danger of being wrecked. Without doubt "Pacific 231" is a masterpiece of technical skill in the making of noise that suggests the movement, the life, of a giant locomotive. One hears it start with rythmic cough as the steam is blown skyward. After reading the programme notes it is not difficult to follow the various noises with which everybody is familiar. But they are not music. Interesting, very; and exciting, but such a mass of unmusical sounds can never be pleasing to the ear.

The orchestra played the "musical" monster with all the virtuosity necessary to produce the desired effect. Mr. Koussevitsky worked his hardest and when safely in the roundhouse "Pacific 231" was given a big hand.

Much was accomplished in the Moussorgsky prelude in soft, rich effects of instrumental color. In this well imagined and cleverly written piece there is opportunity for a real pianissimo and Koussevitsky brought his audience to breathless silence during its performance. The Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo representing the flight of a bumble bee is melodically on the order of Schubert's violin piece, "The Bee." It is a pretty conceit and received such effective presentation that the audience asked and finally obtained its repetition.

The Beethoven symphony, reserved for the final programme number showed the Russian conductor to be a musician of high ideals. Gifted with an imagination that seeks and finds beauty beyond conventional conceptions he made the noble first movement one to be remembered. His reading, throughout held the listener's attention by its wealth of contrast and a beautifully balanced and blended tonal body.

The evening's soloist, Mme. d'Alvarez, sang Bizet's "Agnus Dei" with fervor and good style. Her voice is of considerable volume. She is the possessor of an exceedingly emotional nature and this characteristic brought her sympathetic response. Several recalls were required to satisfy her admirers.

After the symphony, orchestra and conductor received a splendid final tribute of applause the audience remaining in their seat for a few moments to show their full measure of appreciation.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 19 1924

TO HONOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Reception Today, in Charge of Well-Known Women, Is for Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky

Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Edward Burlinghame Hill, Mrs. Paul Sachs and Mrs. Edward W. Forbes form the receiving line at the reception, late this afternoon, in Paine Hall, the Harvard music building in Cambridge, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky. At the tea tables will be Mrs. Arthur Pope, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick S. Converse, Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mrs. A. K. Porter, Mrs. George Edgell, Mrs. Philip Spalding and Mrs. E. C. Moore.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 19 1924

Incidents and Prospects

A mischance on the recent journey westward of the Symphony Orchestra has deprived Mr. Koussevitzky of the clarinet in E-flat essential to a performance of Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel," announced as final number for the concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" will replace it—show-piece of the orchestra in Dr. Muck's time.

Twice and carelessly it has been said in this place that Miss Dusolina Giannini, the newly risen singer, would be "assisting artist" at the concert of the Harvard Glee Club on Dec. 11 in Symphony Hall. In fact, the old-established Mr. Gabrilowitsch will then be assisting pianist. Not until February does Miss Giannini sing with the Glee Club.

Mr. Sedano, the youthful violinist to be heard at Symphony Hall next Tuesday is, of course, a pupil of Auer. Being such, he is a skilful technician with an ear sensitive to tone. Being such again, he clings to stock-pieces—Tartini's "Devil's Trill"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony"; the miscellany common to twenty fiddlers. By believable report he plays "with effortless ease" in a tone "now rich and mellow, [illegible] and crystalline."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 19 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening began its 44th season in Providence, playing in Infantry Hall before a capacity audience. It was an occasion of unusual interest, in that it presented for the first time here the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme, too, both in content and arrangement, held something new and stimulating. There was the Honegger orchestral movement, extremely modern, as a novelty; Russian composers were represented in colorful numbers, and, for vocal soloist, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, a newcomer. Beethoven's Symphgony No. 5, in C-minor, was reserved for the closing number, an innovation in programme arrangement at these concerts.

It was a concert that brought many thrills, not only in the playing of the curious "Pacific 231," but in the breadth, sweep and power with which the masterful, energetic Russian conductor led his band of virtuosi, notably in the opening overture and the first and final movements of the symphony. Strength and tremendous nervous energy are in evidence in Koussevitsky's conducting. Somewhat demonstrative, he plainly shows his complete conception in his work. His magnetism has noticeable effect in the response of the men, who obey with splendid unanimity.

Precedent was broken in the course of the evening's programme, the time honored rule of no encores being suspended after the playing of Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a catchy bit of descriptive writing. After several recalls Koussevitsky reepated the number.

The arrangement of the programme follows:

Berlioz..Oveture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Honegger.."Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement
Moussorgsky.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"
.....Agnus Dei," .....esienne" r, Op. 67

s desk, eeting. ffective ns lit- grasp ful his e At almost vitsky

The s been leader, ter. waited r than e that recent musical news items. This is not strange, as the modernist is now having his day. Occasionally he amuses himself and his audiences with attempts to make musical instruments create illusions of many things which have little relationship to music. In the orchestral movement by Honegger the composer endeavors to produce a "visual impression," a "physical sensation" of a great engine. He has succeeded well, so well that the hearer is in terror of the rushing, roaring, grinding monster which discordantly hurls itself through space and momentarily seems in danger of being wrecked. Without doubt "Pacific 231" is a masterpiece of technical skill in the makin gof noise that suggests the movement, the life, of a giant locomotive. One hears it start with rythmic cough as the steam is blown skyward. After reading the programme notes it is not difficult to follow the various noises with which everybody is familiar. But they are not music. Interesting, very; and exciting, but such a mass of unmusical sounds can never be pletsing to the ear.

The orchestra played the "musical" monster with all the virtuosity necessary to produce the desired effect. Mr. Koussevitsky worked his hardest and when safely in the roundhouse "Pacific 231" was given a hand.

Much was accomplished in the Moussorgsky prelude in soft, rich effects of instrumental color. In this well imagined and cleverly written piece there is opportunity for a real pianissimo and Koussevitsky brought his audience to breathless silence during its performance. The Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo representing the flight of a bumble bee is melodically on the order of Schubert's violin piece, "The Bee." It is pretty conceit and received such effective presentation that the audience asked and finally obtained its repetition.

The Beethoven symphony, reserved for the final programme number showed the Russian conductor to be a musician of high ideals. Gifted with an imagination that seeks and finds beauty beyond conventional conceptions he made the noble first movement one to be remembered. His reading, throughout held the listener's attention by its wealth of contrast and a beautifully balanced and blended tonal body.

The evening's soloist, Mme. d'Alvarez, sang Bizet's "Agnus Dei" with fervor and good style. Her voice is of considerable volume. She is the possessor of an exceedingly emotional nature and this characteristic brought her sympathetic response. Several recalls were required to satisfy her admirers.

After the symphony orchestra and conductor received a splendid final tribute of applause the audience remaining in their seat for a few moments to show their full measure of appreciation.

A. F. P.

Prov. Journal Nov 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Orchestra's New Conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, Impressive in First Appearance Here.

MANY THRILLS PROVIDED

Programme, in Content and Arrangement, Proves New and Stimulating.—Time-Honored Rule of No Encores Suspended

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening began its 44th season in Providence, playing in Infantry Hall before a capacity audience. It was an occasion of unusual interest, in that it presented for the first time here the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme, too, both in content and arrangement, held something new and stimulating. There was the Honegger orchestral movement, extremely modern, as a novelty; Russian composers were represented in colorful numbers, and, for vocal soloist, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, a newcomer. Bethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, was reserved for the closing number, an innovation in programme arrangement at these concerts.

It was a concert that brought many thrills, not only in the playing of the curious "Pacific 231," but in the breadth, sweep and power with which the masterful, energetic Russian conductor led his band of virtuosi, notably in the opening overture and the first and final movements of the symphony. Strength and tremendous nervous energy are in evidence in Koussevitsky's conducting. Somewhat demonstrative, he plainly shows his complete conception in his work. His magnetism has noticeable effect in the response of the men, who obey with splendid unanimity.

Precedent was broken in the course of the evening's programme, the time honored rule of no encores being suspended after the playing of Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a catchy bit of descriptive writing. After several recalls Koussevitsky repeated the number.

The arrangement of the programme follows:

Berlioz.Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Honegger.."Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement
Moussorgsky.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"
Bizet....."Agnus Dei," from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne"
Beethoven..Symphony No. 5 in C-minor, Op. 67
Allegro con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; Trio.
Allegro.

As he appeared at the conductor's desk, Koussevitsky received a warm greeting. He responded by giving a very effective reading of the overture. He seems literally to hold the men in his mental grasp so surely do they follow and fulfil his every indicated interpretative desire. At times during the overture one almost might see, as well as hear, Koussevitsky draw crescendos from the orchestra. The technical side of the men's work has been carefully polished under the new leader, who, apparently, is a fine drillmaster.

To many the orchestral offering awaited with greatest interest was none other than the Honegger "Pacific 231," a piece that has received considerable notice in recent musical news items. This is not strange, as the modernist is now having his day. Occasionally he amuses himself and his audiences with attempts to make musical instruments create illusions of many things which have little relationship to music. In the orchestral movement by Honegger the composer endeavors to produce a "visual impression," a "physical sensation" of a great engine. He has succeeded well, so well that the hearer is in terror of the rushing, roaring, grinding monster which discordantly hurls itself through space and momentarily seems in danger of being wrecked. Without doubt "Pacific 231" is a masterpiece of technical skill in the making of noise that suggests the movement, the life, of a giant locomotive. One hears it start with rythmic cough as the steam is blown skyward. After reading the programme notes it is not difficult to follow the various noises with which everybody is familiar. But they are not music. Interesting, very; and exciting, but such a mass of unmusical sounds can never be pleasing to the ear.

The orchestra played the "musical" monster with all the virtuosity necessary to produce the desired effect. Mr. Koussevitsky worked his hardest and when safely in the roundhouse "Pacific 231" was given a big hand.

Much was accomplished in the Moussorgsky prelude in soft, rich effects of instrumental color. In this well imagined and cleverly written piece there is opportunity for a real pianissimo and Koussevitsky brought his audience to breathless silence during its performance. The Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo representing the flight of a bumble bee is melodically on the order of Schubert's violin piece, "The Bee." It is a pretty conceit and received such effective presentation that the audience asked and finally obtained its repetition.

The Beethoven symphony, reserved for the final programme number showed the Russian conductor to be a musician of high ideals. Gifted with an imagination that seeks and finds beauty beyond conventional conceptions he made the noble first movement one to be remembered. His reading, throughout held the listener's attention by its wealth of contrast and a beautifully balanced and blended tonal body.

The evening's soloist, Mme. d'Alvarez, sang Bizet's "Agnus Dei" with fervor and good style. Her voice is of considerable volume. She is the possessor of an exceedingly emotional nature and this characteristic brought her sympathetic response. Several recalls were required to satisfy her admirers.

After the symphony, orchestra and conductor received a splendid final tribute of applause the audience remaining in their seat for a few moments to show their full measure of appreciation.

A. F. P.

198

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 18 1924

The Boston Symphony Season Opens To-night

To-night will probably mark an important event in the musical annals of Providence for Serge Koussevitzky, the renowned Russian conductor, will be heard here for the first time when he presides over the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's opening as its new conductor. New York has not yet heard the Russian leader but Boston and certain western cities have, and the verdict as to his pre-eminent qualities and his manifest genius is unanimous.

A feature of this concert will be the "Pacific 231," a description of an American locomotive, by the Parisian composer Honegger, which Koussevitzky introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn. Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also scheduled for this program, has also unusual descriptive qualities, and is being introduced to America by this conductor. The rest of the program will include: Berlioz's Overture "The Roman Carnival"; Moussorsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

The soloist will be Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto who will be heard in the Agnus Dei, Bizet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 19 1924

TO HONOR SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Reception Today, in Charge of Well-Known Women, Is for Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky

Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Edward Burlinghame Hill, Mrs. Paul Sachs and Mrs. Edward W. Forbes form the receiving line at the reception, late this afternoon, in Paine Hall, the Harvard music building in Cambridge, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky. At the tea tables will be Mrs. Arthur Pope, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick S. Converse, Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mrs. A. K. Porter, Mrs. George Edgell, Mrs. Philip Spalding and Mrs. E. C. Moore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 19 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening began its 44th season in Providence, playing in Infantry Hall before a capacity audience. It was an occasion of unusual interest, in that it presented for the first time here the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme, too, both in content and arrangement, held something new and stimulating. There was the Honegger orchestral movement, extremely modern, as a novelty; Russian composers were represented in colorful numbers, and, for vocal soloist, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, a newcomer. Beethoven's Symphgony No. 5, in C-minor, was reserved for the closing number, an innovation in programme arrangement at these concerts.

It was a concert that brought many thrills, not only in the playing of the curious "Pacific 231," but in the breadth, sweep and power with which the masterful, energetic Russian conductor led his band of virtuosi, notably in the opening overture and the first and final movements of the symphony. Strength and tremendous nervous energy are in evidence in Koussevitsky's conducting. Somewhat demonstrative, he plainly shows his complete conception in his work. His magnetism has noticeable effect in the response of the men, who obey with splendid unanimity.

Precedent was broken in the course of the evening's programme, the time honored rule of no encores being suspended after the playing of Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a catchy bit of descriptive writing. After several recalls Koussevitsky reepated the number.

The arrangement of the programme follows:

Berlioz..Oveture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Honegger.."Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement
Moussorgsky.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"
Bizet....."Agnus Dei," from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne"
Beethoven..Symphony No. 5 in C-minor, Op. 67
Allego con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; Trio.
Allegro.

As he appeared at the conductor's desk, Koussevitsky received a warm greeting. He responded by giving a very effective reading of the overture. He seems literally to hold the men in his mental grasp so surely do they follow and fulfil his every indicated interpretative desire At times during the overture one almost might see, as well as hear, Koussevitsky draw crescendos from the orchestra. The technical side of the men's work has been carefully polished under the new leader, who, apparently, is a fine drillmaster.

To many the orchestral offering awaited with greatest interest was none other than the Honegger "Pacific 231," a piece that has received considerable notice in recent musical news items. This is not strange, as the modernist is now having his day. Occasionally he amuses himself and his audiences with attempts to make musical instruments create illusions of many things which have little relationship to music. In the orchestral movement by Honegger the composer endeavors to produce a "visual impression," a "physical sensation" of a great engine. He has succeeded well, so well that the hearer is in terror of the rushing, roaring, grinding monster which discordantly hurls itself through space and momentarily seems in danger of being wrecked. Without doubt "Pacific 231" is a masterpiece of technical skill in the makin gof noise that suggests the movement, the life, of a giant locomotive. One hears it start with rythmic cough as the steam is blown skyward. After reading the programme notes it is not difficult to follow the various noises with which everybody is familiar. But they are not music. Interesting, very; and exciting, but such a mass of unmusical sounds can never be pletsing to the ear.

The orchestra played the 'musical" monster with all the virtuosity necessary to produce the desired effect. Mr. Koussevitsky worked his hardest and when safely in the roundhouse "Pacific 231" was given a hand.

Much was accomplished in the Moussorgsky prelude in soft, rich effects of instrumental color. In this well imagined and cleverly written piece there is opportunity for a real pianissimo and Koussevitsky brought his audience to breathless silence during its performance. The Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo representing the flight of a bumble bee is melodically on the order of Schubert's violin piece, "The Bee." It is pretty conceit and received such effective presentation that the audience asked and finally obtained its repetition.

The Beethoven symphony, reserved for the final programme number showed the Russian conductor to be a musician of high ideals. Gifted with an imagination that seeks and finds beauty beyond conventional conceptions he made the noble first movement one to be remembered. His reading, throughout held the listener's attention by its wealth of contrast and a beautifully balanced and blended tonal body.

The evening's soloist, Mme. d'Alvarez, sang Bizet's "Agnus Dei" with fervor and good style. Her voice is of considerable volume. She is the possessor of an exceedingly emotional nature and this characteristic brought her sympathetic response. Several recalls were required to satisfy her admirers.

After the symphony orchestra and conductor received a splendid final tribute of applause the audience remaining in their seat for a few moments to show their full measure of appreciation.

A. F. P.

Prov. Journal Nov 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Orchestra's New Conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, Impressive in First Appearance Here.

MANY THRILLS PROVIDED

Programme, in Content and Arrangement, Proves New and Stimulating.—Time-Honored Rule of No Encores Suspended

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening began its 44th season in Providence, playing in Infantry Hall before a capacity audience. It was an occasion of unusual interest, in that it presented for the first time here the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme, too, both in content and arrangement, held something new and stimulating. There was the Honegger orchestral movement, extremely modern, as a novelty; Russian composers were represented in colorful numbers, and, for vocal soloist, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, a newcomer. Bethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, was reserved for the closing number, an innovation in programme arrangement at these concerts.

It was a concert that brought many thrills, not only in the playing of the curious "Pacific 231," but in the breadth, sweep and power with which the masterful, energetic Russian conductor led his band of virtuosi, notably in the opening overture and the first and final movements of the symphony. Strength and tremendous nervous energy are in evidence in Koussevitsky's conducting. Somewhat demonstrative, he plainly shows his complete conception in his work. His magnetism has noticeable effect in the response of the men, who obey with splendid unanimity.

Precedent was broken in the course of the evening's programme, the time honored rule of no encores being suspended after the playing of Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a catchy bit of descriptive writing. After several recalls Koussevitsky repeated the number.

The arrangement of the programme follows:

Berlioz.Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Honegger.."Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement
Moussorgsky.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee." Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"
Bizet....."Agnus Dei," from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne"
Beethoven..Symphony No. 5 in C-minor, Op. 67
Allego con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; Trio.
Allegro.

As he appeared at the conductor's desk, Koussevitsky received a warm greeting. He responded by giving a very effective reading of the overture. He seems literally to hold the men in his mental grasp so surely do they follow and fulfil his every indicated interpretative desire At times during the overture one almost might see, as well as hear, Koussevitsky draw crescendos from the orchestra. The technical side of the men's work has been carefully polished under the new leader, who, apparently, is a fine drillmaster.

To many the orchestral offering awaited with greatest interest was none other than the Honegger "Pacific 231," a piece that has received considerable notice in recent musical news items. This is not strange, as the modernist is now having his day. Occasionally he amuses himself and his audiences with attempts to make musical instruments create illusions of many things which have little relationship to music. In the orchestral movement by Honegger the composer endeavors to produce a "visual impression," a "physical sensation" of a great engine. He has succeeded well, so well that the hearer is in terror of the rushing, roaring, grinding monster which discordantly hurls itself through space and momentarily seems in danger of being wrecked. Without doubt "Pacific 231" is a masterpiece of technical skill in the making of noise that suggests the movement, the life, of a giant locomotive. One hears it start with rythmic cough as the steam is blown skyward. After reading the programme notes it is not difficult to follow the various noises with which everybody is familiar. But they are not music. Interesting, very; and exciting, but such a mass of unmusical sounds can never be pletsing to the ear.

The orchestra played the 'musical" monster with all the virtuosity necessary to produce the desired effect. Mr. Koussevitsky worked his hardest and when safely in the roundhouse "Pacific 231" was given a big hand.

Much was accomplished in the Moussorgsky prelude in soft, rich effects of instrumental color. In this well imagined and cleverly written piece there is opportunity for a real pianissimo and Koussevitsky brought his audience to breathless silence during its performance. The Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo representing the flight of a bumble bee is melodically on the order of Schubert's violin piece, "The Bee." It is a pretty conceit and received such effective presentation that the audience asked and finally obtained its repetition.

The Beethoven symphony, reserved for the final programme number showed the Russian conductor to be a musician of high ideals. Gifted with an imagination that seeks and finds beauty beyond conventional conceptions he made the noble first movement one to be remembered. His reading, throughout held the listener's attention by its wealth of contrast and a beautifully balanced and blended tonal body.

The evening's soloist, Mme. d'Alvarez, sang Bizet's "Agnus Dei" with fervor and good style. Her voice is of considerable volume. She is the possessor of an exceedingly emotional nature and this characteristic brought her sympathetic response. Several recalls were required to satisfy her admirers.

After the symphony, orchestra and conductor received a splendid final tribute of applause the audience remaining in their seat for a few moments to show their full measure of appreciation.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 19 1924

PLEASING CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS

Orchestra's New Conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, Impressive in His First Appearance Here.—Many Thrills Provided at Infantry Hall Recital.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening began its 44th season in Providence, playing in Infantry Hall before a capacity audience. It was an occasion of unusual interest, in that it presented for the first time here the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. The programme, too, both in content and arrangement, held something new and stimulating. There was the Honegger orchestral movement, extremely modern, as a novelty; Russian composers were represented in colorful numbers, and, for vocal soloist, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, a newcomer. Bethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, was reserved for the closing number, an innovation in programme arrangement at these concerts.

It was a concert that brought many thrills, not only in the playing of the curious "Pacific 231," but in the breadth, sweep and power with which the masterful, energetic Russian conductor led his band of virtuosi, notably in the opening overture and the first and final movements of the symphony. Strength and tremendous nervous energy are in evidence in Koussevitsky's conducting. Somewhat demonstrative, he plainly shows his complete conception in his work. His magnetism has noticeable effect in the response of the men, who obey with splendid unanimity.

Precedent was broken in the course of the evening's programme, the time honored rule of no encores being suspended after the playing of Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," a catchy bit of descriptive writing. After several recalls Koussevitsky repeated the number.

The arrangement of the programme follows:

Berlioz.Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Honegger.."Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement
Moussorgsky.....Prelude to "Khovantchina"
Rimsky-Korsakov....."The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan"
Bizet....."Agnus Dei," from the Incidental Music to "L'Arlesienne"
Beethoven..Symphony No. 5 in C-minor, Op. 67
Allego con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; Trio.
Allegro.

As he appeared at the conductor's desk, Koussevitsky received a warm greeting. He responded by giving a very effeotive reading of the overture. He seems literally to hold the men in his mental grasp so surely do they follow and fulfil his every indicated interpretative desire At times during the overture one almost might see, as well as hear, Koussevitsky draw crescendos from the orchestra. The technical side of the men's work has been carefully polis who, apparen

...er—Ross

To many th with greatest the Honegger has received musical news as the moder Occasionally audiences wit cal instrumer things which music. In t Honegger the duce a "visu sensation" o succeeded we in terror of t monster whi through spac danger of bei
"Pacific 231"
nical skill in the making of noise tha suggests the movement, the life, of a giant locomotive. One hears it start with rythmic cough as the steam is blown sky-ward. After reading the programme notes it is not difficult to follow the various noises with which everybody is familiar.
But they are not music. Interesting, very; and exciting, but such a mass of unmusical sounds can never be pleasing to the ear.

The orchestra played the "musical" monster with all the virtuosity necessary to produce the desired effect. Mr. Kous-sevitsky worked his hardest and when safely in the roundhouse "Pacific 231" was given a big hand.

Much was accomplished in the Mous-sorgsky prelude in soft, rich effects of instrumental color. In this well imagined and cleverly written piece there is opportunity for a real pianissimo and Kous-sevitsky brought his audience to breathless silence during its performance. The Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo representing the flight of a bumble bee is melodically on the order of Schubert's violin piece, "The Bee." It is a pretty conceit and received such effective presentation that the audience asked and finally obtained its repetition.

The Beethoven symphony, reserved for the final programme number showed the

ROSS TO FIGHT McVEY TO-NIGH AT MARIEV

There should be plenty of actio

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 19 1924

Incidents and Prospects

A mischance on the recent journey westward of the Symphony Orchestra has deprived Mr. Koussevitzky of the clarinet in E-flat essential to a performance of Strauss's tone-poem, "Til Eulenspiegel," announced as final number for the concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" will replace it—show-piece of the orchestra in Dr. Muck's time.

Twice and carelessly it has been said in this place that Miss Dusolina Giannini, the newly risen singer, would be "assisting artist" at the concert of the Harvard Glee Club on Dec. 11 in Symphony Hall. In fact, the old-established Mr. Gabrilowitsch will then be assisting pianist. Not until February does Miss Giannini sing with the Glee Club.

Mr. Sedano, the youthful violinist to be heard at Symphony Hall next Tuesday is, of course, a pupil of Auer. Being such, he is a skilful technician with an ear sensitive to tone. Being such again, he clings to stock-pieces—Tartini's "Devil's Trill"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony"; the miscellany common to twenty fiddlers. By believable report he plays "with effortless ease" in a tone "now rich and mellow, [illegible] and crystalline."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 19 1924

CONCERT ONE OF THE FINEST

New Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Surprises

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night was in a good many ways an event. First it introduced Providence to the new conductor, M. Serge Koussevitsky, after the formal introduction had taken place, proceeded to sacrifice several of the sacred cows, to the great joy of the left wing and, it might be surmised, to the chagrin of the extreme right who have ever held certain traditions inviolate.

M. Koussevitsky, as a first move in the Bolsheviki uprising, played Arthur Honegger's Pacific 231 which, coming after Berlioz's eminently respectable Roman Carnival overture, was like quoting Nietsche favorably in an essay upon Henry W. Longfellow. Next, he bid the ensemble rise and share with him the applasue of the audience. He did this twice, a graceful thing, to be sure, but certainly unconventional in staid Infantry Hall where previously the orchestra stuck closely to the chairs. Finally, with a crash as terrific as Pompey's spurred boots tramping through the Jewish Holy of Holies, M. Koussevitsky repeated a number, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of Bumble Bee" which, according to the reliable Philip Hale in a recent comment, has not been done since 1881.

These three smashings are singularly indicative of the personality of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is terrific. He is virile, vigorous and forceful. The gigantic force, like the tremendous energy that is inherent in the race from which he sprang, which is the dominating feature of his leadership, was expressed in the last ounce of power which he drew from the closing movement of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and from the almost Promethean struggle of Honegger's steam engine.

But do not think that M. Koussevitsky is a rude barbaric noise-maker. Far from it. The melancholic richness of the first movements of the Beethoven Symphony was played with sympathy and the understanding of a poetic nature that appreciates both Whitman and Keats, to go over into the literary field for a comparison.

He seemed to have the entire confidence and respect of his men. It is an exceedingly difficult task to take an ensemble, for five years under the leadership of the plump and pleasing Monteux, and bend it to a new will, a different will, a difference best expressed by the physical appearance of the two men, one lean, eager, impulsive, straining and imploring, the other rotund, rich, more or less placid. Under M. Koussevitsky's baton, the Boston Symphony can look forward to new conquests.

Honegger's Pacific 231 was the amazement of the night. "What I wanted to express in the 'Pacific,'" wrote M. Honegger, "is not the noise of an engine, but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it." In other words, he wanted to get metaphysical about a locomotive, metaphysits to the accompaniment of a weird cacophony of drums, horns and screeching violins. The opening of Pacific bid fair to sound like the impression of a starting train as conceived by the drummer in a moving picture house. But that lasted briefly. Gradually, through the seemingly discordant notes and despite some smiles, one felt the grasping and the setting down into music of a tremendous physical power of the sort that is in the spirit of the day. One felt that beyond the impression of the locomotive, M. Honegger was expressing the symbol of the life force of our present world. While this reviewer admits that Pacific was not entirely grasped in meaning, still there was in it—and many of the audience probably will agree—something that terrified in an indescribable way.

Mme. Marguerite d'Alvarez, the soloist, sang Bizet's "Agnus Dei" pleasingly. Her voice has not a wide range or a great depth, but it is rich and full, and it expressed the sadness of the plea for mercy to the Lamb of God.

All told, the concert last night was one of the finest ever held in this city, and we look forward, with pleasant anticipation, to the next appearance of M. Koussevitsky in Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
NOV 19 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY MAKES BOW IN HIS SYMPHONY

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Pleases in First Appearance in Providence

Serge Koussevitzky made his initial appearance here last night as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which opened its 44th season at Infantry hall. Considerable interest has been manifest in the Russian and music lovers wer enot disappointed.

The new conductor of the Symphony has everything a great director should have. He conducts with everything he has and he displayed complete mastery of his orchestra. Koussevitzky was given a warm reception when he made his appearance last night and each number of the well-balanced program was greeted with hearty and sincere applause. The Russian departed from the no encore rule and urged by insistant applause he repeated the Rimsky-Korsakov scherzo, "The Flight of the Bee."

Other numbers on the program were Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; "Pacific 231," Honegger; prelude to "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky; "Agnus Dei," from the incidental music to "L'arlesienne," and the "Fifth Symphony in C minor," Beethoven, allegro con brio, adndante con moto, allegro tria and allegro.

Although a mass of discord, the descriptive number, "Pacific 231" was apparently well liked. Its composer gives a true conception of a giant locomotive from the time it pulls out of a station until it stops and the presentation was a wonderful exhibition of technical skill.

The "Khovantchina" prelude, descriptive of the sun rising over the Moscow Kremlin ,was finely done and the overture. 'The Roman Carnival," was an artistic performance that was well received.

The soloist of the evening was Marguerite d'Alvarez, Peruvian soprano, formerly of the Metropolitan and Boston Grand Opera companies. She sang the "Agnus Dei," with great emotion and understanding and she was recalled several times before the audience was satisfied. She has a remarkably strong, sweet voice of great range.

The final number was the Fifth Symphony and in this Koussevitzky displayed a complete knowledge of the work. Again he departed from the usual custom of pausing between the movements and only after the first was there a wait. The effect, however, was not unpleasant and from the plaintive notes of despair of the first movement to the tirumphant march of the last, the Russian kept his audience spellbound.

Koussevitzky is a true artist and conductor and the performance of the orchestra under his direction last night was one of the best that has ever been given here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
NOV 20 1924

MUSIC

Koussevitzky's Opening Brooklyn Programme

Serge Koussevitzky, who makes his Brooklyn debut at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season here, as its new head, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 28, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, announces the following programme for this occasion:

Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fetes"; Schiabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Beethoven symphony (C minor) was the first great classic score in which Koussevitzky was heeard in this country at the first Boston concert. His interpretation of it was praised unanimously.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 20 1924

MUSIC IN PROVIDENCE

It has sometimes been said that Providence is not a musical city, but this dictum needs to be amended in view of certain recent events, including the initial Boston Symphony concert of the season, which on Tuesday evening drew a capacity audience to Infantry Hall. The fact that Mr. Serge Koussevitsky, the new Russian conductor of that admirable organization, was to make his first appearance here no doubt helped to attract so large a throng, but we have a right to feel that popular interest in music has lately been stimulated in Providence and that this interest will be more evident during the coming season than ever before.

It has also been said that Providence audiences are cold and formal, but the reception given to Mr. Koussevitsky and his skilled performers left nothing to be desired in the way of warmth or sincerity.

Herald
Nov 20

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will comprise Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Marriage"; a little symphony by Boccherini, which has been played in St. Louis, but not in Boston; Debussy's "La Mer," Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" (instead of the "Siegfried Idyl" announced, for Rachmaninoff is expected to be present at one of the concerts and Mr. Koussevitzky wishes to pay him this honor); Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Airs" instead of "Till Eulenspiegel" which had been announced. The orchestra will be out of town next week.

As for Mr. Rachmaninoff, he will give the afternoon concert in Symphony hall next Sunday, playing: Bach-Liszt, Organ Prelude and Fugue, A minor; Bach, Prelude,, D minor, from "The Well-Tempered Clavichord"; Liszt, Sonata, B minor; Chopin, Scherzo, Etude in E major, Ballade, and Etude C minor; Rachmaninoff, Prelude, G major, Etude Tableau, D major Prelude, G flat major; Strauss-Godowsky, "Kuenstlerleben."

Notes and Lines:

In reviewing the recent trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to certain "secondary American cities," such as Buffalo and Pittsburgh, a leading Boston journal announced last evening that during his journey Mr. Koussevitzky "has known the luxury of a private car." How greatly he must be edified by the naive satisfaction which is taken in the thought that every comfort, not to say luxury, is provided for him, as well as by the innocent glee with which the fact itself is proclaimed to a gaping and breathless public.

JUNIUS, JR.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 20 1924

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will comprise Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Marriage"; a little symphony by Boccherini, which has been played in St. Louis, but not in Boston; Debussy's "La Mer," Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" (instead of the "Siegfried Idyl" announced, for Rachmaninoff is expected to be present at one of the concerts and Mr. Koussevitzky wishes to pay him this honor); Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Airs" instead of "Till Eulenspiegel" which had been announced. The orchestra will be out of town next week.

As for Mr. Rachmaninoff, he will give the afternoon concert in Symphony hall next Sunday, playing: Bach-Liszt, Organ Prelude and Fugue, A minor; Bach, Prelude,, D minor, from "The Well-Tempered Clavichord"; Liszt, Sonata, B minor; Chopin, Scherzo, Etude in E major, Ballade, and Etude C minor; Rachmaninoff, Prelude, G major, Etude Tableau, D major Prelude, G flat major; Strauss-Godowsky, "Kuenstlerleben."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 20 1924

199

Notes and Lines:

In reviewing the recent trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to certain "secondary American cities," such as Buffalo and Pittsburgh, a leading Boston journal announced last evening that during his journey Mr. Koussevitzky "has known the luxury of a private car." How greatly he must be edified by the naive satisfaction which is taken in the thought that every comfort, not to say luxury, is provided for him, as well as by the innocent glee with which the fact itself is proclaimed to a gaping and breathless public.

JUNIUS, JR.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND,
OHIO
TIMES
NOV 20 1924

* * *

It is interesting to note that Serge Kussevitsky in his New York debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Nov. 27, will present Honegger's "Pacific 231" and the "Poeme de l'Extase," by Scriabin. The former will be done by the Cleveland orchestra later in the season, and the latter was played on the second symphony concert here, with great success.

* * *

Concert
Nov 20

Incidents and Prospects

Next week, when Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra journey to New York, there will be another interval in the Symphony Concerts. They will be resumed on Friday, Dec. 5, and Saturday, Dec. 6, with a program in tribute to Gabriel Fauré, the French composer, who died a few weeks ago in Paris, full of years and honors. The chosen numbers are Fauré's Prelude to his one opera, "Penelope"; his Elegy for Violoncello and Orchestra; a "Funeral Symphony" from the ancient Locatelli for music of mourning; Ravel's version for orchestra of his piano-piece, "Alborada del Gracioso," since Ravel is Faurá's renowned pupil; Skriabin's "Divine Poem," music, in Mr. Koussevitzky's view, of the creati e spirit in the arts. In this fashion does the conductor "unify" his commemorative program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 21 1924

Honor for Koussevitsky.

A supper in honor of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Lido-Venice on November 28. The committee in charge of the arrangements includes Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Minturn Newbold Morris, Mrs. Richard T. Wilson and Josef Stransky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 21 1924

To Entertain Koussevitsky.

A supper in honor of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Lido-Venice on Nov. 28. The committee in charge of the arrangements includes Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Minturn Pincaot, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mrs. Newbold Morris, Mrs. Richard T. Wilson and Josef Stransky.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

200

Transcript
Nov 22 1924

CONDUCTOR UNEVENLY, COMPOSERS VARIABLY, DOUBTS AND DELIGHTS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT AT LAST FOR QUESTION

Mr. Koussevitzky Overblows Rakhmaninov's Tone-Poem and Blurs Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice"—Amends with Mozart and Boccherini—Debussy, "The Sea" and a Miracle

A TRADITIONAL anecdote of the American theater pictures a vanished manager of musical plays. He came only to the final rehearsals. He made no comment upon the producer's methods or results. He merely took post in the wings, where, from moment to moment, he bawled "Louder! Louder!!" at principals and chorus already stretching their throats to the utmost. Imagination may hardly conceive the grave, silent, self-possessed Mr. Rakhmaninov as shouting anywhere over anything. Yet, ever since his tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," passed into the repertory of the Boston Orchestra, one conductor after another has seemed to hear the composer, like a voice from out the void, crying "Louder! Louder!!" Originally, Mr. Rakhmaninov led the band through the music. At the next performance Mr. Fiedler increased the volume of sound. In turn, Dr. Muck multiplied Mr. Fiedler; while Mr. Monteux outdid them both. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky had his inning, and Mr. Monteux receded, as it were, into reticence. From end to end of the tone-poem, Mr. Koussevitzky kept the orchestra full-voiced. Broad, thick and four-square was the pattern of the music. Emphasis haunted it. At every climax the conductor upreared sonorities. Vociferously he evoked the dead.

The picture by Böcklin stirred Mr. Rakhmaninov to the tone-poem—a picture in which the artist would paint stillness and solitude. His sea is motionless. His skiff seems scarcely to cleave it. His ferryman barely lifts the oars. Silent the mourner grieves. No wind stirs the cypresses of the isle; no wave laps at the cliffs. From the chambers of the dead issues no echo of life. There is no sharpness in Böcklin's drawing; no brightness in his colors. From canvas to canvas he repeated the picture. At length, he believed, he had evoked peace and a sanctuary. . . . Fifteen years ago, as guest of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rakhmaninov conducted in "The Isle of the Dead." Record confirms recollection that he then sought no thickness of texture, no strides and surges of sound, no glowing blocks of color. He kept the music low-voiced; held it within a narrow range of force, weight, motion; subdued the tonal tints and backgrounds; sought, like Böcklin, an imagery and an impression of stillness, solitude and peace. Not unmoved, his hearers understood. . . . Then came the other conductors, practising a profession which perforce must gain effects and cultivate rhetoric. Tempted, they blew hard upon Mr. Rakhmaninov's tone-poem until Mr. Koussevitzky at last has blown it to bursting. Less than ever before "at these concerts" was it applauded yesterday.

Not only is this inflation false to the spirit of the music. It also dulls and clouds the substance. The listener begins to find Mr. Rakhmaninov repetitious and uninventive; in the obscure middle pages suspects him of taking refuge in the Dies Irae because his own imagination has failed; wearies at so labored a progress, at harmonies and timbres ever massed and thickened; half-believes that such music has seen its best days. The youngest generation, indeed, does not hide its contempt. "Any of the latter-day German mediocrities might have written that!" Perhaps Time the Sifter will justify these reproaches. Though Mr. Koussevitzky stressed and surged to the utmost, plainly the music no longer stirred either orchestra or audience. And yet and yet, it is possible to remember Mr. Rakhmaninov towering austere above that very band; out of sound summoning the illusion of stillness, from a hundred musicians upon twenty-five hundred listeners evoking solitude; softening and blending colors, measuring pace and rhythm while the sea stirred not and among the cypresses there was only peace. Then the music, with all its faults upon it, seemed to unlock the chambers of death. Yesterday, to be quite candid, Mr. Koussevitzky made a "holy show" of them.

Nor was the conductor too fortunate with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." The music has barely been revived since Dr. Muck's heyday. Then he made it show-piece to surfeit, but show-piece also in which he and the orchestra wrought their virtuoso-wonders. Above drum or cymbal or triangle, they sounded the cadenzas that introduce the Gypsy Song, like improvisations upon the air. Yesterday they were by no means so graphic. When Rimsky repeats his first movement as third in fresh pattern and new colors, Dr. Muck caught the fantasy, the glow, the sheer exuberance of the repetition. Yesterday we listeners heard but a dexterous composer and a dexterous orchestra. The motiv of the Fandango did not quite prance upon the ear. It was possible to conceive the Variations more clearly figured.

Mr. Koussevitzky, indeed, seemed to have looked too long and too hard at the "vivo e strepitoso" that Rimsky-Korsakov inscribes over his first and his third movements. The conductor was all for the impetus and the onrush of the music, for the high-colored, glinting, changeful surfaces. For moments—but only for moments—he and the orchestra were thrilling to hear, as when they attacked the Gypsy Song only to fling out of it into the Fandango; or when the horns sounded from the Variations magical. Elsewhere, however, Mr. Koussevitzky was over-eager, over-emphatic, until he blurred the finer outlines, thickened the lighter shadings. And small was the need of a quotation from Rimsky's autobiography to prove that he had shaped every arabesque of the shortest cadenza. There is line as well as color in "The Spanish Caprice," pattern as well as surface. For once in zest for delirium, Mr. Koussevitzky clouded detail. For the first time in his stay in Boston, it was possible to understand European reproaches upon energy overdone.

Amends were plentiful in the two eighteenth-century pieces that began the concert—the Overture to Mozart's opera of Figaro; a Symphony in C major of Boccherini. The lightness of tone that Mr. Koussevitzky gained from the orchestra in the Overture gladdened the ear. Through the enranked virtuosi fleetness and precision went hand in hand. When Mozart sets the instruments to bandy phrases, to drop them, catch them, toss them, race for them yet again, the music danced upon the air. Charm and elegance, grace and volatility might hardly further go. Like champagne in free countries, Mr. Koussevitzky outpours such a piece and is unbottling new measures before the last bubbles of the old have vanished. Fancy a music still heady after 132 years and all sorts of repetitions in and out of opera houses. And a music that is the distilled essence of the operatic comedy it preludes—the artifice, the mockery, the gaiety and the dalliance, the wine of life in incessant sparkle with only the lees of passing moments. Ageless, timeless, changeless these exercises of genius in the glint, the ripple, the wit and the comedy of musical sound. "The Barber" is coarse stuff beside this "Figaro." Even "Falstaff" shows streaks.

There is pleasure, too, in Boccherini's Symphony, though only the learned may walk sure-footed when they would differentiate these secondary composers of the eighteenth century—a Boccherini from a Dittersdorf or from both a Locatelli. Boccherini was Italian wherefore melody was in him; but he lived his days largely in Paris and Madrid where artifice might temper song and charm refine upon it. Boccherini was exceedingly fluent. The cataloguing program-book lists his "works" in figures that look like a tradesman's invoice. Yet he had the habit of his time, which in music cultivated aptness of stroke and economy of means. This whole Symphony could have been no more than twenty minutes long. Less than five was the span of each movement. Yet there was the design begun, set in flow, rounded and ended; the minor feat of scholarship, as in the canon of the Minuet; the sensibility to instruments, as in the first two movements; the gentle play of sentiment—over an Audante "Amoroso"; the light elegance of a fleet Finale.

For a moment Boccherini is juggling figures; the next and he is twining tendrils of ornament; the third and he is as innocently melodious as a singing bird whose voice happens to be a little orchestra. (As likely as not, for the texture and the pace of the music, Mr. Koussevitzky's over-abounded in the darker, heavier strings). In sum, a Symphony in little as pleasant to the ear as the miniature upon Monseigneur's snuff-box or the medallions upon the fan of Mme. La Princesse and, as the chances go, much less faded. Boccherini's patrons lived the good life in their Paris of the eighteenth century, the life of an aristocracy graced and charming in the practice of the amenities. By every sign of the Symphony his music was one of them.

Betwixt and between, alike in the quality of the performance and the ordering of the program stood Debussy's three Sea-Pieces. Mr. Koussevitzky played them as one that would overlook nothing. The climaxes, as at the end of the first sketch, were full-throated and full-bodied, out of the depths as well as the heights of the orchestra. Measures of vivid modulation, measures in which a few instrumental voices stand clear and sharp, were etched upon the ear. Long and changeful was the progress from dawn to noonday upon the sea. Not a detail of the sport of the waves passed unheeded. When the sea and the winds made answer, each to each, graphic were the contrasts. That is to say, Mr. Koussevitzky did not overlabor these Sea-Pieces as he over-labored Rimsky's and Rakhmaninov's music. Yet he fell short of the flow of his eighteenth-century numbers, of themselves unfolding, while he (as it seemed) barely directed pace and course. Obviously, as "conscious artist" he was manipulating the Sea-Sketches. They invite such manipulation and gain by it.

The Debussy of The Faun, the Nocturnes, of many a page in "Pelléas," does not write this music of the waters. Gone are the sensuous images, into each other fading or brightening. Gone the sensuous expression, like spontaneous and inevitable vesture. Gone the sensuous and impulsive course as The Faun might dream and remember; as the clouds might sail the heavens; as sirens might see and sing enticing. Even among the Nocturnes, "Fêtes" discloses a conscious art, calculating and unconcealed. In the later days of the Sea-Sketches, it has become a method, a process, a reputation to be sustained, enhanced. Debussy plans the three pieces. They are the largest scaled, the most obviously contrived of all his symphonic music. "From Dawn to Noonday upon the Sea"—a crescendo of waxing light and motion. "Sport of the Waves"—scherzo of rhythms, motivs, harmonies, timbres. The Wind and The Sea in Colloquy that before the end shall not lack thrust, vigor and sweep. There must be incessant modulation—part now of the Debussyan formulas. Motivs have uses, may for the while broaden and deepen melody-like; but rhythm shall be the pervading force and bond. Already the Debussyan canon prescribes as much. Chords, harmonies, timbres, each have their Debussyan course.

The wonder is (as in "Iberia," "Gigues" and "Rondes de Printemps") that a music so written to prescription should still sound fresh and warm. For prescription it was, even if the formulas expressed, as well as cribbed, the composer who for himself had made them. Greater wonder still, a music so precisely devised, yet achieves the imagery and the illusion of the sea, which was its ostensible purpose. The sky and the waters stir, quicken, brighten to golden noon outspread. The waves curl and glint, shimmer and spray through modulation, harmony and timbres. As Tristan heard the light, the listener to "The Sea" hears the spindrift. The waters and the winds chafe and will not be stilled. Upward and downward they shout and sweep. Perhaps, after all, these Sea-Sketches are the miracle of Debussy. He locks himself in his formulas—and he sets free his imaginings.

H. T. P.

Herald
Nov 22

SIXTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mozart's Overture to "Marriage of Figaro" Revives Memories

BOCCHERINI WORK FIRST TIME HERE

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its sixth concert in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart, Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Boccherini, Symphony, C major, op. 16, No. 3 (first time in Boston); Debussy, "The Sea"; Rachmaninoff "The Island of the Dead"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The sparkling overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and what music could be more appropriate as a prelude to Beaumarchais's comedy with its insolence and wit mellowed by Mozart, played brilliantly and at a swift pace that did not forbid clarity, grace and elegance, brought with it pleasant memories. Again we saw Emma Eames, the radiantly handsome Countess in her gorgeous Spanish costume. Again we heard the exquisite "Letter" duet sung by her and Mme. Sembrich, and the latter as Susanna breathing forth her love to the consenting stars. We remembered Edouard de Reszke, lumbering along the stage and singing measures that lay too high for him. Was there ever a more roguish Cherubina than Pauline Lucca? There was Campanari in the old days, a sly, malicious humorous Figaro. And there were performances in English that we would gladly see again, with Clara Louise Kellogg, the charming Zelda Seguin and William Carleton, surpassed by no one as the dashing, amorous, jealous Count. Alas, Postumus, Postumus, the fleeting years!

Maurice Barres wrote many pages to show how El Greco, the painter, arriving at Toledo and making it his home was influenced in his art by that venerable and sombre city. Was Boccherini, the Italian dwelling in Madrid, affected by Spanish surroundings? Was his music, and he was incredibly fertile, changed in native spirit by the stately court, the music of the old masters for the church, the folk and gypsy tunes of the street and the bleak country? We doubt it from the compositions by him that we have heard; purely Italian in melody and simple harmony, pleasing to the ear with here and there a haunting strain that led Champfleury to liken this music to a rose colored ribbon tenderly preserved for years in a lavender scented drawer of rosewood in the chamber of a noble dame. In the symphony of yesterday there were a few measures that might have been written by Mozart; a few that were Haydenesque; but the movements were distinctly Italian. In all probability Boccherini's name will long live by reason of the familiar minuet from a string quartet. Perhaps Debussy 50 years from now will be only the man of "The Faun's Afternoon" and Rachmaninoff, the writer of the Prelude, which James Huneker swore was composed for the funeral of a piano tuner in Brooklyn, N. Y.

To us "The Sea," in spite of certain beautiful and striking passages, is as a whole inferior musically and aesthetically—the two words are not always synonymous—to the "Afternoon" and the "Nocturnes." Nor is this impression derived from A's, B's or C's interpretation; nor is it due to any consideration of pictorial or naturalistic effects, whether they are vivid or pale. One might say of a conductor, he is not a true Debussyite; he does not appreciate the value of the hints, vague suggestions, demi-tints; he does not respect Debussy's indications. But what if his interpretation produces a composition that, bearing Debussy's name, might excite the envy of the composer if he were living? Or does any composer hear his own music twice alike? We know from personal experience that men as unlike as Brahms and Gounod, conducting their own works, paid little attention to the indications in the printed score.

And here comes up a question about Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem. When he conducted at a Symphony concert, 15 years ago, his "Island of the Dead," the music seemed throughout to be quietly elegiac; the prevailing, persistent color was gray. There was no frenzy of lamentation, no shrieking against the decree of inexorable Fate; there was no suggestion of dramatic and stormy intensity, any more than in Boecklin's picture itself. Yet the succeeding conductors in Boston, without exception, have turned this poem, after the opening measures, into a thing of storm and stress. It would be interesting to know whether Rachmaninoff would conduct his work in 1924 as he interpreted it in 1905. Today the music itself is not so imposing as it first seemed. Is it not too long drawn out, in a word, verbose and at times platitudinous? Or does this feeling come from the modern interpretations?

Rimsky-Korsakoff took pains to say in his autobiography that his Caprice on Spanish Airs is not a magnificently orchestrated piece; it is a brilliant composition for the orchestra . . . a purely external piece, but vividly brilliant for all that."

Brilliant it surely was as Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it, inspiringly rhythmed, performed with compelling dash and bravura by solo players and the whole orchestra. Yet this Caprice is not to be ranked among the Russian's finest works. ("Splendid" is the better word, for this music has a certain splendor.) Now that the concert is over, we look back with the greater pleasure on the music of Mozart and Boccherini, the interpretation of their works and of many pages of Debussy's "Sea."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will go to New York next week. The program for Dec. 6 has been arranged in memory of Gabriel Faure; Locatelli, Funeral Symphony; Faure, Elegy for violoncello and orchestra, and overture to "Penelope"; Ravel, "Alborada del Gracioso"; Scriabin, Symphony No. 3, the "Divine Poem."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 22 1924

FOR many, liberal and conservatives alike, the outstanding music event of the approaching week is the debut here on Thanksgiving night of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra. The temperamental Russian has the staid Beantown folks staggering from Symphony Hall with eyes bulging and knees trembling, or leaning helplessly against the rails. Koussevitzky has caused the greatest emotional to-do in the home town since the Braves took the World's Series some seasons back, and New York, with its musical ear ever close to the gound, is neither lying supinely back nor ignoring the commotion. For the past few seasons the local concerts of the Boston Orchestra have not seen Carnegie Hall's doors stormed by an excited populace. Time was—but time is long and art is fleeting; or the attendance was, to the distaste of the Boston musicians whose visits here were once regarded as epochs in music.

Now gaze on this picture. Even before Koussevitzky has exhibited his wares or proved his worth here we find Carnegie Hall completely sold out for the Thursday night series of five concerts with the Saturday afternoon affairs almost on Thursday's heels. Yet the Boston band is the same organization it was last year when its playing was scarcely surpassed in this country. We must have our thrill, however, and the megnetic conductor, the one with personality, the one who astonishes is the one to follow. The music is not always the thing with us.

Mr. Koussevitzky comes to America from an active season in western Europe as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and conductor of his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris; he also conducted operas at the Paris Grand Opera and in Barcelona.

In western Europe, for the last four seasons, Koussevitzky has been a striking figure in the concert halls.

Before 1920, his career was largely confined to his own country. He was born in Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874. At the age of twelve, he conducted the town theatre orchestra. At the Moscow Conservatory, he was required to study either a brass instrument or the double bass. He chose the latter, became a virtuoso, toured Europe with his double bass, and composed for it. In 1909 he organized and subsidized the "Koussevitzky Orchestra," which soon became famous throughout Russia. Each summer he took his forces the length and breadth of his country, even chartering a Volga steamer. He gave free concerts in countless provincial towns where symphonic music had been unknown.

Koussevitzky champions the coming composer of genius, not only by performing his music, but by publishing it in the firm of "S. & N. Koussevitzky," which he owns jointly with his wife.

Sixth Concert of the Boston Symphony

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Mozart, Overture to "Marriage of Figaro."
Boccherini, Symphony in C major.
Debussy, "La Mer."
Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34.

This program was perhaps the most interesting, from every point of view, Mr. Koussevitzky has so far given. Others have excited more curiosity as to what he would do with this or that composition, others have contained more novel music, yet this of yesterday afternoon showed Mr. Koussevitzky in a better light as an interpreter than have the preceding five, which have rather served to impose his personality upon audience and orchestra than to reveal the inherent qualities of the music played.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Koussevitzky, was almost completely forgotten, so thoroughly was he imbued with the music in hand, and seemed no longer a soloist playing an incidental part in a series of 24 concerts, but an integral part of them. He and the orchestra seemed more in each other's confidence and the sympathy between them was clearly evident in the quality of the performance.

The most remarkable feature of remarkable afternoon was the playing of Debussy's "La Mer." It requires no very long memory to recall the time when these three symphonic sketches were considered a difficult problem to both listener and player. Was this not perhaps due to the way in which they were played? Certain it is that whatever the qualities of Dr. Muck as a conductor he was hardly to be considered a sympathetic interpreter of such characteristically French music as this, and Mr. Monteux was perhaps of too precise a nature to bring out fully the beauties of this music of fancy and dream.

It remained for Mr. Koussevitzky, more temperamentally adapted to it, to give a performance than which no better has so far been heard here, and which was as near perfection as may be. At last even the most conservative will hardly allege that Debussy's music lacks melody, that its harmonies are strained and unnatural. Played in this way, it is as clear, melodious and logical as that of Mozart, and hearing it thus we realize that the composer, instead of being such a radical innovator as many have claimed, has but carried on the noble traditions of the school of Rameau and Couperin.

In another fashion, Mr. Koussevitzky was no less successful in the playing of the other pieces on the list. Often he has given pieces of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a modern tinge hardly in their character. But yesterday he played the Symphony of Boccherini and Mozart's more familiar overture with a charm and grace, a freedom from extravagance, beyond praise. To be sure, some may object to the extremely rapid tempo in which the overture was taken, but clarity was not sacrificed and the whole was given with such a delicacy and lightness of touch that such a critic would indeed be hard to satisfy.

The impression which Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" originally created has somewhat worn away. The taste of the present day calls for simpler, clearer music, and these overcharged measures are not so impressive as they were.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant orchestration could not conceal the poverty of melodic and harmonic invention of his Spanish Caprice. It served to display to advantage the virtuosity of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday was more restrained in his gestures than heretofore and the concert gained immeasurably thereby.

S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 22 1924

To Honor Conductor at Supper

Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest of honor at a supper at the Lido-Venice on November 28. The committee includes Mrs. Minturn Pinchot, Mrs. Newbold Morris, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mrs. Richard T. Wilson and Josef Stransky.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
NOV 22 1924

Sixth Concert of the Boston Symphony

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Mozart, Overture to "Marriage of Figaro."
Boccherini, Symphony in C major.
Debussy, "La Mer."
Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead."
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34.

This program was perhaps the most interesting, from every point of view, Mr. Koussevitzky has so far given. Others have excited more curiosity as to what he would do with this or that composition, others have contained more novel music, yet this of yesterday afternoon showed Mr. Koussevitzky in a better light as an interpreter than have the preceding five, which have rather served to impose his personality upon audience and orchestra than to reveal the inherent qualities of the music played.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky, as Mr. Koussevitzky, was almost completely forgotten, so thoroughly was he imbued with the music in hand, and seemed no longer a soloist playing an incidental part in a series of 24 concerts, but an integral part of them. He and the orchestra seemed more in each other's confidence and the sympathy between them was clearly evident in the quality of the performance.

The most remarkable feature of a remarkable afternoon was the playing of Debussy's "La Mer." It requires no very long memory to recall the time when these three symphonic sketches were considered a difficult problem to both listener and player. Was this not perhaps due to the way in which they were played? Certain it is that whatever the qualities of Dr. Muck as a conductor he was hardly to be considered a sympathetic interpreter of such characteristically French music as this, and Mr. Monteux was perhaps of too precise a nature to bring out fully the beauties of this music of fancy and dream.

It remained for Mr. Koussevitzky, more temperamentally adapted to it, to give a performance than which no better has so far been heard here, and which was as near perfection as may be. At last even the most conservative will hardly allege that Debussy's music lacks melody, that its harmonies are strained and unnatural. Played in this way, it is as clear, melodious and logical as that of Mozart, and hearing it thus we realize that the composer, instead of being such a radical innovator as many have claimed, has but carried on the noble traditions of the school of Rameau and Couperin.

In another fashion, Mr. Koussevitzky was no less successful in the playing of the other pieces on the list. Often he has given pieces of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a modern tinge hardly in their character. But yesterday he played the Symphony of Boccherini and Mozart's more familiar overture with a charm and grace, a freedom from extravagance, beyond praise. To be sure, some may object to the extremely rapid tempo in which the overture was taken, but clarity was not sacrificed and the whole was given with such a delicacy and lightness of touch that such a critic would indeed be hard to satisfy.

The impression which Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" originally created has somewhat worn away. The taste of the present day calls for simpler, clearer music, and these overcharged measures are not so impressive as they were.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant orchestration could not conceal the poverty of melodic and harmonic invention of his Spanish Caprice. It served to display to advantage the virtuosity of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday was more restrained in his gestures than heretofore and the concert gained immeasurably thereby. S. M.

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 22 1924

SUPPER FOR S. KOUSSEVITSKY.

A supper for Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Lido-Venice on November 28. The committee in charge includes Mrs. Minturn Pinchot, Mrs. Newbold Morris, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mrs. Richard T. Wilson and Josef Stransky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
NOV 22 1924

Lovers of the finer compositions for orchestra in this neighborhood have cause for congratulation in being afforded opportunities for hearing performances by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky next week.

Mr. Damrosch and his forces will give the second in the series of Symphony Concerts for Young People in the assembly hall of the Montclair High School next Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. In presenting the following program Mr. Damrosch will prelude each performance with explanatory comments:

March from the "Lenore" Symphony .....Raff
Andante from Symphony No. 5, Beethoven
"In the Spinning Room".....Dvorak
Three dances from the "Nutcracker" suite .....Tschaikowsky
(a) Trepak, Russian dance.
(b) Chinese Dance.
(c) Dance of the Flowers.

Under the auspices of the Unity Concert Course of Montclair, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the same auditorium next Wednesday night. Its appearance, aside from the fact that it is one of the finest organizations of its kind in the country, will have a particular interest for the reason that Mr. Koussevitzky will direct its performances. In seeking a conductor to succeed Pierre Monteux, who returned to Paris last spring after having been identified with the Bostonians for several years, the management opened negotiations with the noted Russian, who had strongly impressed audiences in the French capital and in London by his ability. They succeeded in engaging him. Making his American debut six weeks ago in Boston, he proved to be an authoritative conductor, whose personal magnetism is felt in work of his musicians. In securing his services the orchestra has a musical director who will maintain the reputation it won under Gericke, Nikisch, Muck and Monteux.

The following program will be presented.

Concerto in D Major....C. P. E. Bach
Arranged by Maximilian Steinberg.
Overture—"The Roman Carnival," Berlioz
Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," Moussorgsky
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from the opera, "Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Beethoven

* * *

[illegible] Girl Wins Scholarship

American
Nov 22

LOST ITALITAN SYMPHONY REVIVED

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony program was composed about one hundred and fifty years ago. The piece was Boccherini's Symphony in C major, played for the first time in Boston.

Until very recently the only thing that had apparently survived from this Italian's numerous works was the celebrated "Minuet." It was good to heard something else of his, not only for the change, but also because this Symphony was worth the hearing.

It has a virtue which is rare these days—brevity. The slow movement is a beautiful song, and the last movement has an unusually short and surprising cadence at the close. There is a good deal of solo work for various instruments. The work was beautifully rendered at yesterday's concert.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a remarkable performance of Debussy's "La Mer." Whatever one might think of the musical impressionism that this group of pieces stands for, even the most conservative listener must have been impressed yesterday by the beauty of the music as presented by the conductor.

A climax sounds dramatic, no matter how often you may have heard it under another conductor before. A pianissimo sounds pianissimo, and is miles apart from a fortissimo, according to Mr. Koussevitsky, which is as it should be. The applause after the Debussy pieces was very long, and the conductor called on the orchestra to share it with him.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

Globe
Nov 22

BOCCHERINI FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

Composition of 1775 Is Presented by Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky, at yesterday's Symphony concert, kept to his announced intention of giving one piece new to Boston on every program, but this time he eschewed the moderns in favor of a symphony in C major by Luigi Boccherini, composed in 1775. Everybody knows one piece by Boccherini, the minuet. Few have heard more than an occasional additional specimen from his voluminus works. The symphony played yesterday has had its instrumentation revised by Dr Sondheimer. It is claimed that he has made only the indispensable alterations in the text to fit it for performance in a large hall by a modern orchestra.

If this symphony is a fair sample, other music by Boccherini should be republished in modern editions. Mr Martino's 18th century orchestra has of late years proved to Boston audiences that there is a wealth of exquisite old music buried beneath the dust of European libraries, whence Mr Martino has resurrected many lovely things. Now that the 19th century is going out of fashion, musically speaking, it is good to be reminded that other and earlier centuries have left us priceless legacies of beauty.

YKoussevitzky conducted Boocherini with the rhapsodist's imagination he brings to everything. All his readings are intensely personal, save when the music obviously fails to touch his emotions, as was the case with Mozart's overture to "Figaro" yesterday. Koussevitzky cares less for clarity and elegance of style and more for warmth of heart and fervor of expression than one assumes Boccherini to have cared. If one believes that there is a gulf between the moods of Chopin and the 18th century, one will not care for Koussevitzky's Chopinesque Boccherini.

Debussy's "The Sea" was yesterday more strenuous than tenuous. One wondered whether the composer really wanted as much sound and fury as Koussevitzky put into the "dialogue of wind and sea." But Koussevitzky, one must remember, is a rhapsodist. "The Sea" is the least successful of Debussy's major works, anyhow. Neither Muck, Rabaud nor Monteux have been able to make it sound.

Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," suggested by Boecklin's picture, has long been a familiar repertory piece here. Koussevitzky, by taking the opening section rapidly and blurring it, managed to intensify the climaxes later in the work. Here is music upon which a temperament like Koussevitzky's can work wonders. The morbid intensity of mood in painter and composer is of the essence of romanticism. Koussevitzky feels with Boecklin and with Rachmaninoff, and makes his hearers feel with them, the uncanny stillness, the strangeness of old, unhappy, far-off things. Incidentally, this is one of the few works of Rachmaninoff that proclaims him a genius.

Koussevitzky's vivid and subtle sense of rhythm made the performance of Rimsky Korsakov's brilliant and utterly artificial "Spanish Caprice" remarkably effective. He is a virtuoso conductor, as well as a rhapsodist. But a devotee of Mozart cannot quite forgive him for not lingering more lovingly over every detail in the beautifully wrought outline of the "Figaro" overture, instead of merely overstressing the strong accents, as if that were the only way to avoid dullness in Mozart.

There are no Symphony concerts here next week, as Koussevitzky will make his New York debut. P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
NOV 22 1924

Boston Symphony O[rchestra] Conductor, Serge[i] Heard Here Next [Week] grams—Philharmoni[c]

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his New York debut when this orchestra's New York season opens in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 27, and Saturday afternoon, November 29. The opening program contains a title that has not been heard here before and will include Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra in D minor (edited by Siloti); Weber's "Oberon" Overture; Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuage and Fetes; Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

At the Saturday afternoon concert the interest will be much greater. Russian composers will divide the first part of the program with Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmilla, Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Tsar Saltan, and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, this to have its first New York performance. The program will close with Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CINCINNATI,
OHIO
BILLBOARD
NOV 22 1924

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Will Give Five Monday Night Concerts

In addition to its regular series of symphony concerts in Boston there will be five Monday evening concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky as conductor. Each concert will have a regular symphony program, and the dates are December 1, January 12, February 9, March 30 and April 27, and the soloists will be Dusolina Giannini, soprano; Mieczyslaw Munz, pianist; John Charles Thomas, baritone; Myra Hess, pianist, and Richard Burgin, violinist and concert master of the orchestra. The demand for subscription tickets for this series has resulted in almost selling out the entire five concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 22 1924

Koussevitzky, Damrosch, et al.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will make his Carnegie Hall debut on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. His first programme consists of an unfamiliar Vivaldi concerto, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The Saturday programme is made up of Glinka's "Rouslan and Ludmilla" overture, Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" prelude, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bee" and Serge Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite.

Walter Damrosch, for the con[ductor] of the New York Symphony [Orch]estra [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
NOV 22 1924

Symphony Competition

Conductors of the various symphony orchestra which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At lest they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary . . . in view of the extensive literature available for orchestra.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, and Hadyn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Koussevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly od composition will be.

201
THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
PRESS
NOV 22 1924

Symphony Competition.

Conductors of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary . . . in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Hadyn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's "Pacific 231" is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Kousevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly odd composition will be.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 22 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his New York debut at this orchestra's season opening in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. His program for Thursday is Vivaldi, concerto, D minor, arranged by Siloti; Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Debussy two nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festival"; Honegger, "Pacific 231"—which this conductor introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy." His matinee program is Glinka, overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; Moussorgsky, prelude to "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from "Tsar Saltan"; Prokofieff, "Schythian Suite," new here; Brahms, symphony, No. 4.

100-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City
NOV 22 192[illegible]

Koussevitzky's Debut.

Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his New York debut at the first local concert of the orchestra for this season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, and his second appearance the following Saturday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky announces the following program for Thursday:—Vivaldi's concerto in D minor (arranged by Siloti); Weber's overture to "Oberon"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festival"; Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," which this conductor introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

On the matinee programme there will be Glinka's overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from "Tsar Saltan;" Prokofieff's "Schythian Suite" (first New York performance), and the fourth symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 22 1924

WILL GIVE LECTURE ON ORCHESTRAL INSTRUMENTS

A special, illustrated lecture on orchestral instruments, will be given Monday afternoon at 4:40 o'clock in the lecture hall of the Boston Public Library, under the auspices of the Division of University Extension, Massachusetts Department of Education. The lecture will be given by Richard G. Appel, head of the music division of the Boston Public Library, assisted by Gaston Bladet, flute and piccolo; Louis Speyer, boe and English horn; Paul Mimart, clarinet; Boaz Piller, bassoon; Max Hess, French horn, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The lecture also will be illustrated with stereopticon slides.

202 Advertiser
Nov 22

SYMPHONY IN FINE FETTLE

At yesterday's Symphony concert there was a brilliant performance of a none too interesting program.

Boccherini's C-major symphony, composed back in the eighteenth century, was heard in Boston for the first time. It is a work that discloses Mr. Koussevitzky's catholicity of taste, and it proved a good virtuoso piece for the orchestra, but intrinsically it is unimpressive. Mozart's "Figaro" overture, written about the same time and leading off this week's Symphony program, proved much more enjoyable.

Debussy's "La Mer," Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead"—a symphonic poem evidently revived in honor of the composer, who will play at Symphony Hall tomorrow—and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Caprice on Spanish Themes" are the other numbers.

The orchestra was in fine fettle. Mr. Koussevitzky, by the way, gave the Rachmaninoff piece a melodramatic reading.

Traveler
Nov 22

production.

SYMPHONY

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the coming week will be occupied by the opening of this orchestra's season in New York. The seventh program for Boston will be dedicated to the memory of Gabriel Faure, and the late French composer's elegy for 'cello and orchestra, and the overture to "Penelope" will be played. Mr. Koussevitzy will also perform Locatelli's "Funeral Symphony," Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem."

The opening program of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall Dec. 1, will include the following symphonic numbers:

Weber's overture to "Oberon," De Falla's "El Amor Brujo" (Love the Sorcerer), Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

WHITEMAN

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitsky is to make his New York debut this week, so that there are no Boston Symphony concerts here. The program for Dec 5 and 6, as now arranged, includes the "Elegie," for cello and orchestra, by Gabriel Faure, in memory of the composer, who died two weeks ago in Paris, Faure's overture "Penelope"; a "Funeral Symphony" by Locatelli, another obscure 18th century composer; Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem."

The instrumental numbers for the first Monday concert, Dec 1, as now announced, are all taken from recent program of the regular series of Symphony concerts, thus abandoning the excellent precedent set by Mr Monteux, of not duplicating programs in the extra series. The pieces to be heard, unless Mr Koussevitsky changes his mind and his program, as he very often does, are Weber's "Oberon" overture; de Falla's "Love, the Sorcerer," Honegger's "Pacific, 231," and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony." The repetition of the Honegger is welcome, but why not vary the classics for the benefit of those who go to both series of concerts?

The soloist at this first Monday concert will be Dusolina Giannini. Miss Giannini's career has been noted from time to time in this column. She is from Philadelphia, still under 25, a pupil of Sembrich and acclaimed even by such veteran reviewers as W. J. Henderson, who has heard everybody for 40 years past, as a phenomenal singer, both vocally and musically. Miss Giannini has not sung in Boston before. She is to be heard with the Harvard Glee later in the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

Reminiscences of Koussevitzky

VLADIMIR DUBINSKY, 'cellist and teacher of this city, and a companion in his youth of Serge Koussevitzky, who appears in New York this week as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes THE TIMES of early days spent with the conductor, as follows:

The engagement of Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings to me many memories of days of our youth. They are concerned mostly with Koussevitzky as the wonderful bass player I knew him to be, for it was long before any one, even Koussevitzky himself, conceived the idea of taking up the baton. Koussevitzky studied at the Music Dramatic School of the Moscow Philharmonic Society. I was a pupil at the Moscow Imperial Conservatory. We were both advanced students, and in vacation time during one Summer we accepted positions with a symphonic orchestra to play at a seashore place called Mayorenhoff, situated on the Baltic Sea near Riga, now the capital of Latvia. As there were very few Russians there, Koussevitzky and I were drawn close and we became "pals." Koussevitzky's name in Russian is Sergei, and for short, Serioja. He was a lovely chap—amiable and congenial. He was also ambitious, energetic and determined in his decisions, but very modest about his ability as a musician. In my opinion, no matter what instrument he had studied, he would have attained the same great results that he reached on the bass viol. Especially I used to love practicing together on our respective instruments. We would start with scales, go over to 'cello studies, and wind up with concertos. Koussevitzky would play along, keeping pace with the 'cello on the bass fiddle. There was no limitation for him. Listening to Koussevitzky one would forget that he was playing a bass; it wasn't a bass at all, it was some instrument between a 'cello and a bass, of unusual beauty. He possessed everything that makes a great artist—tone, technical equipment, temperament, repose, a keen sense of rhythm and fine conception.

At the close of our season in Mayorenheff Koussevitzky learned of a vacancy in the orchestra of the St. Petersburg Imperial Grand Opera Theatre and he decided to compete for it. The aspirants were mostly graduates from the local conservatory. One among them was pointed out to Koussevitzky as the "star" who would certainly get the position. Koussevitzky was a stranger, unknown and looked upon with a condescension.

The contest began. Koussevitzky was the first one called to play. Before he commenced he explained to the judges that he always tuned his instrument one tone higher than the customary pitch for the sake of brilliancy and clarity. But while Koussevitzky was tuning the instrument one of the jurors, who happened to be the professor for the bass department in the Conservatory of St. Petersburg (later Petrograd and now Leningrad), stopped him, objecting to this unusual tuning as a trick. As I said before, Koussevitzky was very determined in his decisions. He immediately addressed the Chairman of the jury, who overruled the objection, leaving to the artist the use of his instrument as he saw fit. When Koussevitzky had finished, there was spontaneous applause, against all rules, from audience as well as jury. Half the number of the contestants left the place, deciding not to compete at all. The position was awarded to Koussevitzky without much deliberation by every vote except, of course, the professor's.

Then came a surprise. Koussevitzky, having won the position, refused to accept it. He had his reasons. Each desk in the orchestra of the Court Opera had a different salary, and some of the men used to play twice a week for the ballet performances, for which extra remuneration was due. It happened that the desk of the position in question was not supposed to play the ballet. On this ground Koussevitzky rejected the position to the amazement of the entire theatrical administration. It was an unheard thing for a musician to refuse a position in the Imperial Theatre. The Russian Imperial Theatres were offering to their musicians at that time a year's salary for about eight or nine months' service; a full pension after twenty years, or half-pension after ten years of service; sick benefit; free education for the children of employees, and last but not least the title of Artist of Imperial Theatres, which was of no little significance in a country where division of classes existed as it did in Russia; this title meant a good deal for social and civil standing. However, Koussevitzky secured a similar position in the Moscow Court Theatre, where his desk was also playing the ballet performances. In a year or so he was advanced to the first desk as the first bass player at the Moscow Grand Opera and from that time on his fame began to grow.

Of Koussevitzky as the conductor and orchestra organizer, I learned while I was already in this country. I am conversant with the fact that the press had acclaimed him wherever he appeared at the head of an orchestra. I can say only this much: that if he directs the orchestra the way he played the bass violin when I knew him, he must be a remarkable orchestra leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST
NOV 23 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, IN RE.

And now that the smoke of debate has cleared away and the noise of controvertal words have died down what is really the consensus of opinion concerning Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many were the opinions held and most of them conflicting though there seems to be a general agreement on one or two points. First it is quite agreed that he is a "dry" conductor. It struck us that he was most awfully sec in the classicists, certainly he was no dry-bones in the modernists.

He impressed us as being the Heifitz of conductors; competent, abounding in technique and with a platform personality that was as flat as a warmed over Boston baked bean. Whatever he did his head dictated it and not his heart, and the result was that many of his phrases were dreadfully angular.

Then again he over-tempos his works. He rushes them without any too much regard for the phrase content. He has a delightful languorous touch when he chooses to exercise it but it is all too seldom.

His treatment of the brasses was vicious. Time after time on Friday night they blew a blatty tone, and a horn without velvet closely approaches an old square piano with its thin, tinny tone.

Most people are agreed that he has disciplined the orchestra. Certainly there were sharper contours than when Monteux stood at the helm. It was apparent in the Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart, that he had imparted to the men precisely the effects that he wanted days before at rehearsal. That those effects were good or ill is a matter of conjecture. We think poorly of them.

Some people felt that he was playing to the gallery, which is bosh. Mannerisms he had and plenty of them, but just because a man exercises his idiosyncrasies and is different from the run o' mine conductor is no indication that he is playing to a gallery. The only thing that really plays to a gallery is a stimulating performance, and in this respect we think Serge Koussevitsky failed.

His programs were far from being exciting. We have heard better from the old bands that used to play at the Point Exposition. There were only one or two numbers that were really outstanding and they were the Brahms, Scriabin and Rimsky-Korsakow works.

We should say speaking without much bias, that Boston had a talented press agent. Certainly no conductor has so failed to live up to the penciled paragraphs of "passion" and "emotionalism." He possesses vitality, but he left us cold and chilly.

FEDERATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
~~SAT. NIGHT~~
News
NOV 23 1924

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra came first and was attended with high hopes; for several days after I was sorting out impression from convictions until finally I realized the dismal truth that I was wrestling with disappointment. Viewed in retrospect, I place the blame on Koussevitzky rather than on the orchestra, although I shall reserve him for discussion, in company with the other conductors, in a succeeding article. The program opened prosaically with the "Oberon" overture, then passed to a novelty in this country, Roussel's Symphony in B-flat, and finally rattled Symphony Hall with a Wagner group.

I am judging, of course, from this particular program wherein the orchestral quality, as a whole, was only fair, the inferiority being traceable, so far as I could judge, to the brass and to part of the woodwind section. The strings impressed me as very fine. The solidity seemed sufficient, but there were times when the balance of tone was definitely uncertain, this happening most strangely in the overture itself and later in the Siegfried Funeral Music. The orchestra was a flexible enough instrument, the equal to any others except the Philadelphia orchestra and there was, in the course of the Wagner numbers some exquisite light and shade.

For the Roussel Symphony I express gratitude mildly; it is good to have heard it; I doubt if it is really significant or indicates the trend of symphonic expression or anything else except the earnest endeavors of M. Roussel to express a very limited pin-hole view of life. It is true there are so-called classics no greater than this, and the presentation of the Roussel work was a proper and courageous duty for Mr. Koussevitzky to perform. I can almost forgive him for other things just for his courage. It doesn't take a very brave man to present a masterpiece.

STIFFNESS VANISHES.

The orchestral stiffness which was characteristic of the Roussel interpretation completely vanished in the Wagner music and its many very fine qualities were revealed in the most voluptuous reading of the Bacchanale I ever have blushed at. Nor was it possible to withhold admiration for the swift apprehension with which the orchestra translated Mr. Koussevitzky's intentions in the Siegfried and in the sententious Mastersingers March. Perhaps the whole secret lies in further acquaintanceship between conductor and men. So many good elements can not just fall short of consummation without a reason.

Finally, there is the State Symphony Orchestra of New York, under honored and honorable Josef Stransky. This orchestra troubled me more than any other, for it passed swiftly from moments of real splendor to incomprehensible chasms of mediocrity. On analysis I find a note of indifferent woodwind and insufficient percussion. The orchestra shared with the New York Symphony (Damrosch), a fine solidity and in balance of tone it is the peer of the Philadelphia and the Damrosch organization. Chiefly it lacked flexibility, nor was the unanimity of ensemble always achieved, while the enunciation of subordinate phrases was lazy.

The program consisted of Beethoven's Third (Eroica), Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," Liszt's "Les Preludes," and Bruch's First Violin Concerto in G minor, played by Sylvia Lent, who was heard by Ann Arbor audiences at the last festival. Beethoven is always Beethoven, even when played cautiously; but the Bruch number was the only thing, as presented on this program, to really merit consideration from a sophisticated public.

Here then are the five great orchestras of the East, everyone of them a first class instrument of great beauty and resourcefulness In attempting to appraise them there is no desire to lose sight of the fact that they are, with whatever defects under close scrutiny, the best in the land—and that means the best in the world. Orchestras rise and fall for many reasons, chief of which, of course, is the conductor. When one of these orchestras offers less than its best it is most usually a reflection not on the capacity of its personnel, but on an unfortunate lack of coherence and continuity from conductor through composition to band.

It is necessary to remind the reader that this analysis is based on a very limited hearing; with the exception of the Philharmonic Society I heard the orchestras only in one concert. Obviously such an analysis carried throughout a season might show different results. The variable factors in individual concerts are many. The conclusions here set forth are based wholly on what I heard, and the choice of program was set between narrow limitations on the calendar.

Having, with such temerity, offered an opinion on the orchestras it is the purpose to discuss, in a succeeding article, the five conductors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 23 1924

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitsky is to make his New York debut this week, so that there are no Boston Symphony concerts here. The program for Dec 5 and 6, as now arranged, includes the "Elegie," for cello and orchestra, by Gabriel Faure, in memory of the composer, who died two weeks ago in Paris, Faure's overture "Penelope"; a "Funeral Symphony" by Locatelli, another obscure 18th century composer; Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem."

The instrumental numbers for the first Monday concert, Dec 1, as now announced, are all taken from recent program of the regular series of Symphony concerts, thus abandoning the excellent precedent set by Mr Monteux, of not duplicating programs in the extra series. The pieces to be heard, unless Mr Koussevitsky changes his mind and his program, as he very often does, are Weber's "Oberon" overture; de Falla's "Love, the Sorcerer," Honegger's "Pacific, 231," and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony." The repetition of the Honegger is welcome, but why not vary the classics for the benefit of those who go to both series of concerts?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Telegraph
NOV 23 1924

Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky announces programs for his New York debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to open its season here in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 27, and Saturday afternoon, November 29.

At the Thursday concert there will be played: Vivaldi's Concerto for orchestra in D minor (edited by Siloti); Weber's "Oberon" Overture; Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuage and Fetes; Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ectasy."

At the Saturday afternoon concerts, Russian composers will divide the first part of the program with Glinka's Overture to Ruslan and Ludmilla; Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" from "Tsar Saltan;" Prokofieff's Scythian Suite (this is to have its first New York performance). The program will close with Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Telegraph
NOV 23 1924

Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite."

Sergei Prokofieff was only 23 when he wrote his "Scythian Suite," which is to be introduced to New York by Koussevitzky next Saturday. Scythia was a legendary place, differently located by Herodootus and others, but ascribed to Southern Russia. The people were obviously barbaric, as the young Russian musically describes them. The suite has four movements as follows:

I. Invocation to Veles and Ala. The music describes an invocation to the sun, worshiped by the Scythians as their highest deity, named Veles. This invocation is followed by the sacrifice to the beloved idol, Ala, the daughter of Veles.

II. The Evil-God and dance of the pagan monsters. The Evil-God summons the seven pagan monsters from their subterranean realms and, surrounded by them, dances a delirious dance.

III. Night. The Evil-God comes to Ala in the darkness. Great harm befalls her. The mon rays fall upon Ala, and the moon-maidens descend to bring her consolation.

IV. Lolli's pursuit of the Evil-God and the sunrise. Lolli, a Scythian hero, went forth to save Ala. He fights the Evil-God. In the uneven battle with the latter, Lolli would have perished, but the sun-god rises with the passing of night and smites the evil deity. With the description of the sunrise the suite comes to an end.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
NOV 23 1924

Mr. Koussevitzky's first Brooklyn programme will be Berlioz's "R Roman Carnival" overture, Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Nuages" a "Fetes"; Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy," and Beethoven's "Fifth Sy phony."

Although Scriabine's remarkable score has been heard here befo (notably as conducted by Albert Coates, who was a close personal frie of the Russian composer), many who have heard Koussevitzky interpr this music, both in Europe and America, call his performance nothing le than a revelation. The late Russian modernist accompanied Koussevitz on one of his famous Volga expeditions when he took his orchestra a specially chartered steamer and presented symphony concerts to th townsfolk along the way. Scriabine then had the opportunity of witnessing the effect of his "Poem of Ecstasy" upon audiences who had never before heard symphony music.

Koussevitzky's Volga Tours

Among the number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitzky there is probably no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga. There might have been more of these trips, the last one of which was in the spring of 1914, but for the historical events that arose, to the disturbance of European art and politics.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theatre prices, listened to the concerts in their own town theatres, and were served with regular symphony programmes. Even with box office accounts, Koussevitzky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple financial undertaking to hire one hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accommodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends), and sail for 2,500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way.

Such an excursion was, of course, a chance for a Russian to study his people, and it is not surprising that Stanislavsky, of the Russian Art Theatre, was a guest on one of these tours. Scriabine also, as aforestated, made the journey, and had the unique experience of observing his own modern music suddenly thrust upon an absolutely untutored and incredibly receptive people. Edward Risler, the French pianist, went along as soloist, playing the E flat ("Emperor"), and G major concertos of Beethoven. Koussevitzky gave them such symphonies as Beethoven's 3rd and 7th, Rachmaninoff's 2nd, Tschaikowsky's 5th, Liszt's "Mazeppa," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, etc. In a word, his programmes were such as are regularly heard by the musically sophisticated in any great metropolis.

Arthur M. Abell, the distinguished music correspondent, who was a guest on the last tour, thus described the effect which this music made:

"I was deeply interested," wrote Mr. Abell at the time, "in observing the effect that such music, magnificently played, made on those audiences. Although musically uncultured, they were very intelligent and highly receptive. They displayed an instinctive feeling for the lofty and the beautiful, and reacted to Koussevitzky's spirited readings as a high strung horse does to a master hand at the bridle. The enthusiasm was genuine and spontaneous, and the auditors listened with rapt attention. It was like watching the face of an unspoiled child while listening to a beautiful fairy tale, and, indeed, to those Russians on the remote Volga this was a veritable fairyland of beauty that Koussevitzky revealed to them. Before this advent they had never heard a symphony orchestra, and had never even seen many of the instruments. At Saratow a deputation of the citizens called on Koussevitzky at his hotel and requested that he place the harps at the front of the stage at the concert in order that the people could see and admire those beautiful instruments.

"A few hundred miles north of Astrakhan we visited a tribe of Kalmucks, a wild, nomadic people, living in tents something after the manner of our Indians. Strange to say, these half-savage people were worshipers of Buddha, and carried a Buddha temple about with them on their wanderings over the trackless steppes. When the tribe saw the big steamer approaching their shore, they thought that the Czar had come to make them a visit, and they turned out in full force to welcome us. The men proved to be very friendly, and I took some interesting snapshots of them, but the women were very shy and would not be photographed, believing that the camera was an instrument of the devil."

Nov 23 THE WORLD: SUNDAY

OPERA AND CONCE

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra who makes his New York Debut Thursday

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 23 1924

Koussevitzky Makes Debut Thursday; Local Orchestras

Hadley Leads Philharmonic Saturday; Novelties on Damrosch Programs; Weston Gales With State Symphony November 30

Serge Koussevitzky will make his New York debut at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Thanksgiving Day, with a program including Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi organ concerto in D minor, Scriabini's "Poème de l'Extase" and Honegger's "Pacific 231." On Saturday afternoon Brahms's Fourth Symphony will follow Russian numbers, including the first New York performance of Serge Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." This work, written by Prokofieff at the age of twenty-three, has four movements with the following "program":

I. Invocation to Veles and Ala. The music describes an invocation to the sun, worshiped by the Scythians as their highest deity, named Veles. This invocation is followed by the sacrifice to the beloved idol, Ala, the daughter of Veles.

II. The Evil-God and dance of the pagan monsters. The Evil-God summons the seven pagan monsters from their subterranean realms and, surrounded by them, dances a delirious dance.

III. Night. The Evil-God comes to Ala in the darkness. Great harm befalls her. The moon rays fall upon Ala and the moon-maidens descend to bring her consolation.

IV. Lolli's pursuit of the Evil-God and the sunrise. Lolli, a Scythian hero, went forth to save Ala. He fights the Evil-God. In the uneven battle with the latter Lolli would have perished, but the Sun God rises with the passing of night and smites the evil deity. With the description of the sunrise the suite comes to an end.

"Festivals"; Honegger's locomotive piece, the "Pacific 231," which this conductor introduced to Europe last spring and to America this autumn, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

On the matinee program there will be Glika's overture to "Rusian and Ludmilla"; Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from "Tsar Saltan"; Prokofieff's Scythian suite (first New York performance), and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 23 1924

Koussevitzky's Debut In Varied Program

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will make his New York debut as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Thursday the Russian conductor will be heard in Vidaldi's concerto in D minor (arranged by Siloti); Weber's overture to "Oberon"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 23 1924

Koussevitzky Here Friday With the Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard for the first time in Brooklyn next Friday evening, when this orchestra opens its season of Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music. The Russian conductor will be heard in the following program: Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

This conductor has long been famous in Europe for his sympathetic and revealing interpretations of the music of Scriabine, his compatriot and close friend The "Poem of Ecstacy" figured upon the program of Koussevitzky's American debut at the opening of the orchestra's season in Boston last month.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was the first classical symphony in which he was heard in Boston. Its performance was unanimously passed as a remarkably eloquent and inspired interpretation.

PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
NOV 23 1924

Owing to the presence in Boston of Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist, Mr. Koussevitsky, the new Boston Symphony leader, very appropriately placed on last week's symphony program his distinguished fellow countryman's tone-poem, The Island of the Dead (after the picture of Arnold Boecklin). Other works given at the Friday rehearsal and the Saturday concert were Mozart's Overture to Figaro; Boccherini's symphony in C major; Debussy's symphonic sketches, The Sea, and Straus' Till Eulenspiegel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 23 1924

If only the applause were discriminative, even at the afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra! The audience at these concerts in former years was, as a rule, icy cold when any new work was produced, unless it were by a local composer, when it was loudly applauded irrespective of its merit. Unfamiliar works were viewed with suspicion. The word for an unknown composer was: "'Eave 'arf a brick at him." Now the audience is palpitating and ecstatic. The hearers are as enthusiastic over an ultra-modern work as one by old man Brahms. Is it Mr. Koussevitzky's compelling personality and magnetism that worked this surprising somersault of attitude? He is certainly to be commended for not wishing disturbing applause between the movements of a symphony or suite.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
NOV 23 1924

World of Music

RUSSIAN music and Russian artists dominate the week's music calendar in Brooklyn. A conspicuous event will be the debut on Friday night, at the Academy, of Serge Koussevitzky, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A feature number of Mr. Koussevitzky's programme will be Alexander Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." On Saturday night, Feodor Chaliapin, greatest of Russian dramatic singers, makes his first Brooklyn appearance, with the Metropolitan Opera Company (at the Academy), in Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff." That this internationally famed artist, who has been before the American public for nearly twenty years, has never sung in Brooklyn is the more strange in view of the fact that the metropolitan critics, with one exception, failed to recognize his genius during the New York opera season of 1906-07, when Chaliapin first appeared at the Metropolitan—the lone critic being Helen Bartlett Bridgman, writing for the Brooklyn Standard Union. This reviewer alone then gave Chaliapin a glad critical hand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS,
MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
NOV 23 1924

203

Symphony Competition.

Conductors of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary . . . in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Hadyn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Koussevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly odd composition will be.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 23 1924

Symphony Competition

Conductors of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary * * * in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, and Haydn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here with Kousevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly odd composition will be.

204

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY'S DEBUT

Serge Koussevitzy, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard for the first time in Brooklyn on Friday evening when this orchestra opens its season of Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music. The Russian conductor will be heard in the following program: Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Debussy's "Poem of Ecstasy"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was the first classical symphony in which he was heard in Boston. Its performance was unanimously passed as a remarkably eloquent and inspired interpretation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 23 1924

Next Friday evening, Nov. 28, in the Academy of Music, Serge Koussewitzky will be heard for the first time in Brooklyn, when he presides at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening concert here, as the orchestra's new leader. The Russian conductor will be heard in the following program: Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Scriabin's score figured on Koussewitzky's opening Boston's program; while Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was included upon his second program there as the first classical symphony which he performed in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
NOV 23 1924

Symphony Competition.

CONDUCTORS of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary . . . in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Hadyn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Koussevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly odd composition will be.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
NOV 23 1924

THE first of the Boston Symphony's concerts will take place Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct here for the first time Concerto, by Vivaldi; overture, "Oberon," by Weber; "Nuages" and "Fates," by Debussy; "Pacific 231," by Honneger; "Poem of Ecstasy," by Scriabin. At the Saturday afternoon concert Russian music by Glinka, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Prokofieff, and Brahms's Fourth Symphony will be presented.

Herald

Nov. 23

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
NOV 23 1924

Symphony Competition.

Conductors of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary . . . in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Haydn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultramodern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Kousevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly odd composition will be.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

Philip Hale of The Boston Herald published a letter from a subscriber of the Boston Symphony concerts who complained bitterly of the deadly perfume affected by one of her neighbors. Mr. Hale said: "What would this poor woman have done if she had seen the performance of 'The Song of Solomon' in Paris in 1891? There was an appeal to the nose as well as to the eye and ear. For the first device, the music was in D major, the color bright orange and the hall was perfumed with violet. Each scene had its particular perfume. And when 'A Trip to Japan in Sixteen Minutes' was performed at the Carnegie Lyceum in New York, Oct. 28, 1902, a newly invented apparatus spread perfumes in the hall. This was the first experimental perfume concert in America.

"Our correspondent should have called an usher, pointed out the offender and said: 'Sir, remove that smell.' Then she could have enjoyed de Falla's charming music and sat, untroubled, through the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD
NOV 23 1924

Symphony Competition.

Conductors of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of program material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Altho Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, and Haydn have upheld the traditions of the classicists there seems a tendency toward utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Kousevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretation of that amazingly odd composition will be.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 23 192

The reviewers of Buffalo and Pittsburg concerts were not unreservedly in favor of Koussevitzky's conducting of the Boston Symphony. Mary M. Howard in the Buffalo Express thought his version of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony conventional and ineffective. She objected to the unusual tempi. Harvey B. Gaul in the Pittsburg Post was far more drastic. He thought Koussevitzky unemotional and objected to his lack of tonal balance and euphony, especially in his management of the brass choirs in the orchestra. He did not at all like the readings of the pieces played except the Brahms Fourth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

Koussevitzky's program for the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall includes:

Overture, "Ruslan and Ludmilla".....Glinka
Prelude, "Khovantchina".....Tchaikovsky
Scherzo, "Tsar Saltan"..Rimsky-Korsakoff
Scythian suite, Op. 20 (new).....Prokofieff
Fourth symphony .....Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

Koussevitzky has chosen an all-Tchaikovsky program for the first Boston Symphony pension fund concert of the season, Dec 14, at 3:30. Possibly he can make such an occasion interesting by the vividness of his interpretations, but one can imagine only one worse infliction, an all-Puccini program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
NOV 25 1924

New York Symphony Plays "The Poem of Ecstasy"

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, Nov. 23—Scriabin's symphonic poem, "Ecstasy," furnishes material for discussion here just now, having been presented on the evening of Nov. 21 at Carnegie Hall by the New York Symphony Orchestra, and being announced for performance in a few days at the same place by the Boston Symphony. In the view of many persons, the work seems to represent the best in modernist achievement in Russia, and perhaps the best in modernist effort anywhere, after Debussy. Ask anybody what he thinks of this piece in comparison with Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," and you can pretty certainly count on an answer favorable to Scriabin.

Really, the writings of Scriabin should not be thought of as either better or worse than those of Stravinsky. They should be regarded only in the light of their purpose; and in that case they will be desired because they complement, rather than because they displace, Stravinsky's. Give us the poem, "Ecstasy," for its sentimentalism; give us "Spring" for its satire. We want them both.

Externally, Scriabin is only another Tchaikowsky in a highly specialized romantic mood; or another Brahms, carrying the doctrine of thematic development to an untold extreme of refinement. And so, in spite of his strange system of chords and his extraordinary scheme of orchestral colorings, he is far from being the most original of modernists. Or, in other words, instead of making absolutely new experiments, he merely carries old ones to greater lengths. In "Ecstasy," he carefully prepares a double harmonic background, upper and lower, the first being of woodwind and the second of string instrument tone. This he builds out of his chief themes; and when it is done, he projects upon it a vast melody in brass tone, giving the effect of a song in strong timbres, accompanied by itself in the weaker. Into the whole organism he infuses an emotion that—well, that impresses some listeners profoundly and that disturbs others uncomfortably. The peal of the trumpet toward the close of the work is a veritable blast of Roland in the vale of Roncevaux. The New York Symphony audience, after hearing that eight-mile call on the occasion of this concert, showed uncertainty, to think whether it meant that Roland was jesting on the plain or was summoning the hosts of Charlemagne to the conflict. Let us wait and see what the B. S. O. audience does.

Included in the program of the concert was the Bach concerto in D minor for two violins, Messrs. Kochanski and Spalding, soloists. Enough to say that these artists were a perfect choice on the part of Mr. Damrosch, the conductor, as associates.

W. P. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

"Boris Godunoff," with Chaliapin, Bourskaya, Tokatyan and Mardones, will be given by the Metropolitan company at the Brooklyn Academy next Saturday night.

Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday night includes Locatelli's "Funeral Symphony," Fauré's "Elegy" for 'cello, Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Scriabin's "Poem Divine."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will make his New York debut as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the season's opening here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

A series of five extra Monday evening concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky Dec. 1, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 30, and April 27. The soloists will be Dusolina Giannini, Mieczyslaw Munz, John Charles Thomas, Myra Hess and Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra.

The Philadelphia Civic Opera opened

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 23 1924

Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, the former the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra of Boston, were guests of honor at one of the most important receptions of the week last Wednesday afternoon at the Harvard Music Hall in Cambridge. In the receiving line was Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, wife of the president of Harvard University, with Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. E. Burlingame Hill, wife of Professor Hill, Mrs. Paul Sachs, Mrs. Edward W. Forbes and others. The ladies presiding at the tea table included Mrs. Arthur Pope, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick S. Converse, Mrs. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. E. C. Morre, Mrs. A. K. Porter, Mrs. George Edgell and Mrs. Philip Spalding.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its young people's concerts Nov. 4. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program included pieces by Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and d'Indy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 23 1924

Serge Koussevitzky makes his New York début at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night, as follows:

Concerto, D minor.....Vivaldi-Sfiotti
"Oberon," overture.....Weber
"Nuages" and "Fetes".....Debussy
"Pacific 231".....Honegger
"Poem of Ecstasy".....Scriabin

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program next Friday in Brooklyn, incorrectly announced elsewhere in THE TIMES today, will consist of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, Debussy's "Two Nocturnes," Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, conducted by Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 23 1924

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra goes to New York to give that metropolis its first hearing of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor. By report anticipation runs high.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 27 1924

Brahms's E minor symphony: "Sir Henry Wood always seems to take this composer by the sleeve and to ask him with a nudge not to be quite so solemn. Mr. Albert Coates makes him appear to express his sentiments more profusely than is his wont, and one has even known M. Koussevitzky to compel him to dance the Zopak."—Manchester Guardian.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
STAR
NOV 24 1924

Symphony Competition

Conductors of the various symphony orchestras which carry on their schedules here are hard put to it in the matter of programme material. At least they seem to be; for every little while there is a duplication of compositions, which causes one to wonder if the choices made are necessary . . . in view of the extensive literature available for orchestras.

Although Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Haydn have upheld the traditions of the classicists, there seems a tendency towards utilizing as much ultra-modern material as hands can be laid on. Honegger's Pacific 231 is going the rounds, and presently the Boston Symphony is to do it here, with Koussevitsky leading. It will be interesting to discover just what his interpretations of that odd composition will be.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 24 1924

CONDUCTOR VINDICATED

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—The music critics of the Boston papers are second to none in America, keen, cultured and competent in their calling and uniformly fair and kindly in their treatment of matters musical.

In Saturday's paper they were unanimous in finding that Koussevitzky's treatment of Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" was exaggerated, over emphasized and too noisy. All were comparing Friday's performance with their memory of the poem's rendition at the hands of the composer in 1909. Although the programme book stated that the composer had revised and rewritten parts of it, they implied that Mr. Koussevitzky had taken liberties with it and overstressed the forte passages.

At the conclusion of the piece, Saturday night, the applause was tremendous and Mr. Koussevitzky pointed out a man clad in an ill-fitting gray business suit sitting at the left of the hall near the stage, applauding with continental enthusiasm. He liked the performance and approved Mr. Koussevitzky's version for he stepped to the stage and held up his hand to congratulate the conductor. It was Mr. Rachmaninoff.

MUSIC LOVER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 24 1924

In Character

Mr. Vladimir Dubinsky, a Russian violoncellist now resident in New York, tells The Times a tale of Mr. Koussevitzky's early days in Leningrad as player upon the double-bass. Little known and treated with condescension by the Scribes and Pharisees of the Conservatory, he entered a competition for a seat in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera.

Koussevitzky was the first one called to play. Before he began he explained to the judges that he always tuned his instrument one tone higher than the customary pitch for the sake of brilliancy and clarity. But while he was making ready one of the jurors, who happened to be professor in the bass department of the Conservatory, stopped him, objecting to this unusual tuning as a trick. By nature and habit Koussevitzky was very determined in his decisions. He immediately addressed the chairman of the jury, who overruled the objection, leaving to the artist the use of his instrument as he saw fit. When Koussevitzky had finished there was spontaneous applause, against all rules, from audience as well as jury. Half the contestants left the place, deciding not to compete at all. The position was awarded to Koussevitzky without much deliberation by every vote except, of course, the professor's.

Then came a surprise. Koussevitzky, having won the seat, refused to accept it. He had his reasons. Each desk in the orchestra of the Court Opera had a different salary, and some of the men used to play twice a week at the ballet performances for extra remuneration. It happened that the desk in question was not supposed to play for the ballet. On this ground Koussevitzky rejected it, to the amazement of the administration. It was an unheard-of thing for a musician to refuse a place in the Imperial Theater. However, Koussevitzky secured a similar position in the Moscow Court Theater, where his desk was also playing for the ballet performances. In a year or so he was advanced to the first desk, and from that time his fame began to grow.

Incidents and Prospects

By invitation of Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Rakhmaninov sat inconspicuously in the audience at the Symphony Concert on Saturday. At the end of the composer's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," the conductor bade him to the stage. Mr. Rakhmaninov, however, went no farther than the gangway between the platform and the first row of seats. There he lifted a congratulatory hand to Mr. Koussevitzky and received the plaudits of the company.

Monsieur Rabaud, sometime conductor of the Boston Orchestra and now high-placed in officialdom at Paris, has written the music to an historical film, "The Miracle of the Wolves," screened under the auspices of the State.

It is in order to suggest that Mme. Landowska, mistress beyond all others in our time of music for the harpsichord, might make welcome return to Boston. She is in America again; she is giving concerts elsewhere; while last autumn she was heard here publicly but once—in the hampering circumstances of a supplementary Symphony Concert. The Division of Music at Harvard might reasonably invite her to a recital. It has done as much for talents less rare.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
NOV 25 1924

friends and relatives here.

Among those who attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo last week were Mr. and Mrs. Earl W. Haviland, H. W. Smith, Oliver Willis Halsted, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Shearer, Miss Julia Heard, Leonard, Miss Helen Roony, Miss Marguerite Waiste, Miss Woodward and Mrs. Harry Gardner.

Mrs. John M. Jack of Vandalia, [illegible]

(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 26 19[illegible]
Telegram
New York City

Coming Koussevitzky!

And now our town is awaiting Sergei Koussevitzky. It is no secret that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which the sensational Russian (nobody has ever denied his being sensational) will lead in Carnegie Hall tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon are sold to ceiling and doors. After the well known turkey and the too well known mince pie, as many replenished diners as Carnegie Hall can hold will welcome the conductor from Moscow and Paris to Manhattan soil. We shall then see whether tomorrow's crowd will be affected as was the second Boston audience of the Russian batonist. The story is told by the expert observer of the Boston Transcript, who modestly signs himself "H. T. P." in the usually unheated pages of that highly esteemed journal:—

"In calm yesterday went the first part of the symphony concert. Mr. Koussevitzky, as it were, had been discovered. Matrons and maidens had looked upon him and found him good to behold. His 'stage deportment' was impeccable, and, by paradox, also interesting. His tranquil incomings and outgoings, quiet bows, poise between pieces, were all flawless. Yet when he flung up an arm to check ill-timed clapping, or with outspread and embracing gesture gathered the orchestra into better placed plaudits, there was no doubting the quick mind, the ready will.

"True, Mr. Koussevitzky, actually conducting, abounded in tense and energetic play of body. His countenance upon occasion reflected the fervors within. His eye, as well as hand, broadcast them. With his own lips he would now and then shape exacting measures. His down-beat could be electrically precise. His upper might sweep the air with curve and climax. Yet what were all these things but the draughts of his spirit blowing the flame of performance? The heat, the light, were inspiriting to feel. At a first concert our most decorous dowagers, our least sensitive demoiselles, had paid to Mr. Koussevitzky the homage of excitement. At the second what was there to do but await the return of that agreeable sensation?"

It seems safe to predict that a Carnegie Hallful of New Yorkers will pass the evening of Thanksgiving pleasurably.

P. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM My Telegraph
NOV 28 1924

Star Dust and Fiddlesticks

By THEODORE STEARNS.

The Bloodthirsty Lamb.

About Koussevitzky.

A very large and very enthusiastic audience officially welcomed Serge Koussevitsky to New York last night at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. That tells the story, but it would take pages to describe the interest and the excitement this distinguished visitor caused. Mr. Koussevitsky in one appearance has built up a considerable following, and has given musical conversationalists enough material for a year of discussions.

Koussevitsky clicks, to use a little Broadway slang; he gets over his stuff, and that's the final test. In a program that included Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," he showed that the advance notices calling him a modernist were true—he is a modernist, and a serious one.

This conductor is student through and through. Every bit of music has been analyzed and carefully weighed before he allows it to be played, and when a score is sounded before an audience it becomes monumental, rather awing. Mr. Koussevitzky is a stickler for detail, and sometimes sacrifices joyous rhythm for a particular effect.

He plays the modern music every bit as well as he does standard works, which is unusual to say the least, in the light of some unsatisfactory "first times" heard in New York this season and last. This is his most interesting point. "The Poem of Ecstasy" last night reached beautiful heights, and "Pacific 231" became a rare bit of musical pleasure.

In short, Mr. Koussevitzky is powerful but dignified; he does not lean toward romanticism. If in the New York series of concerts this season he plays the "Pathetic," there will be several surprised persons about.

H. J. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
NOV 28 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY MAKES BATON DEBUT HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Introduces Leader — Banner Day at Opera with "Parsifal" and "Barber of Seville"

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

PROPERLY preceded by praiseful rumors from various European capitals and from Boston, Serge Koussevitzky came to Carnegie last evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and proved conclusively that all the enthusiastic advance reports had done him full justice.

Leonard Liebling.

The Hub orchestra has not played for years as it performed last night. Its former brilliancy, polish, and tonal beauty appear to have returned in large measure under Koussevitzky. He has firm grasp, keen appreciation of sound and color relations, and an incisive manner of revealing constructive details. He possesses, too, a flexible beat, love for sharp contrasts, and dramatic instinct.

He is of youthfully slim appearance and has a graceful but decisive way with his baton.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

* * *

IT has been my duty several times in the past to set down impressions of "Parsifal." In each case they were unfavorable so far as my personal reaction to the work is concerned. That is not important, however. What really is important is the fact that many persons like "Parsifal," pay their money to hear it, and look upon the work as a deep and devotional sermon, to be attended especially on Thanksgiving Day and Good Friday. None shall gainsay such persons their earnest pleasure.

Yesterday afternoon's "Parsifal" hearing once more confirmed my ineradicable belief that Wagner not only did not feel this music or play, but wrote it chiefly because of the sure appeal of the subject and the opportunities it offered for the profitable monopoly which its composer created at Bayreuth.

MARGARET MATZENAUER

Aside from the fact that Huneker revealed Wagner's Jewish ancestry, he was not even a good Christian. If you don't believe it, and would know what manner of man this genius was in his private life, read Ernest Newman's "Richard Wagner." You might then agree with me that this composer could have felt no sincere religious stirrings and that his "Parsifal" is simply a grand opera masquerading in churchly garb and rituals.

Under Bodanzky's baton, "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan is atmospheric and interesting for those who like it. The able principals were the same as last year, Messrs. Laubenthal, Whitehill, Bender, Schuetzendorf and Mme. Matzenauer as Kundry. The lesser roles also were in capable hands. The scenic and lighting effects could not be improved upon.

* * *

Surveying Skriabin

At Mr. Koussevitzky's first concerts in Boston, last October, his audiences heard Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." At his concerts next week they will listen to Skriabin's "Divine Poem." For interlude, a paragraph by Mr. Gilman about this music may slip into reprint. It is quoted from the New York Herald-Tribune: "Forget, for a moment, the voluptuous and gorgeous instrumentation of the 'Poem of Ecstasy' and look at the musical ideas that it clothes so splendidly. They are almost as banal, as trite, as sweetly sentimental, as if they had sprung from the bonbon eroticism of Gounod at his worst—a Gounod who has become just a little drunk on Eau de Tristan. The biting hyenas and stinging, lovesick snakes that Skriabin saw in his lyrico-poetic hasheesh dreams have become merely pretty ladies from chocolate-box covers; but Skriabin, unaware of their frailty, has blown them up by the wind of his hysterical ecstasies to superhuman, to monstrous, size. They scream and rant in the pages of his finale with what their creator thought was mystic ecstasy, but which sounds to us pathetically like hifalutin' bombast. That portentous theme which Skriabin's trumpets blare out as if he thought it would lift him into the sensuous heaven of his dreams, sounds more and more like a sort of cosmic salon music every time we hear it."

Transcript
Nov 28

Programs in Prospect

At the first of the supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting and Miss Dusolina Gianinni assisting singer.

Overture to the Opera, "Oberon".....Weber
Air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Suite from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer,".....de Falla
Orchestral Movement, "Pacific, 231".....Honegger
Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.....Beethoven

At the third of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, in Sanders Theater, at Cambridge next Thursday evening, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Scythian Suite.....Prokofiev
Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Fetes".....Debussy
Spanish Caprice.....Rimsky-Korsakov

Honors Russian Conductor

In honor of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be a supper at the Lido-Venice to-night. The committee includes Mrs. Daniel Menocal, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Richard T. Wilson, Mrs. Minturn Pinchot, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mrs. Newbold Morris and Josef Stransky, conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 28 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 28 1924

Serge Koussevitsky, famous Russian conductor, made his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra and Michael Mordkin is back at the Winter Garden after an absence of more than a decade.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 28 1924

REALM OF MUSIC

By Frank H. Warren

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his local debut last evening in Carnegie Hall where the Bostonians gave their first concert of the season. The big audience, bent on welcoming the stranger, was prodigal with its applause, venturing into complimentary demonstrations before and after every number played. Those who were looking for something sensational in conducting technique or in unconventional mannerisms lost, as the Russian was quite reserved and continent with his gestures. For a listener his beat is easy to follow and one may travel along with Koussevitzky and enjoy watching him carve a melodic line, polish a phrase or construct a climax. One feels this conductor's authority and one is drawn to him by virtue of the "magnetism" in his make-up, the quality concert goers seem to look for.

Every number on the program was interpreted and played with the minutest attention to detail—phrasing, tonal balance, polish, clarity, expression—and the enthusiasm of the audience increased as the concert proceeded. There were fine spun pianissimos, scarcely audible and sonorous climaxes; there were "readings" that differed from those to which the ear has been accustomed; there were tempi that all would not agree with, but none would deny the conductor's sincerity. His interpretations were of music as he felt it.

The opening number, a concerto for orchestra in three movements by Vivaldi, and the "Oberon" overture showed M. Koussevitzky grasp of the classic and romantic schools. They were both treated with refined taste, breadth and flexibility. The Debussy "Nuages" and "Fetes" were, for us, the most satisfying performances. Never before have we heard them so perfectly done—the "Clouds" almost ethereal in their composition—the orchestra scarcely ever playing so loud as forte. Honegger's locomotive stunt, "Pacific 231," that Mr. Damrosch introduced to us, was a more gentlemanly engine than Mr. Damrosch's, who chose to drive an "iron horse" of the freight type. Scriabine's "Poem of Extasy" found Koussevitzky on his most familiar territory. While this work does not to us appear great music, the conductor certainly made it thrilling by his juggling of tones and his exasperating climaxes—always about to bring us face to face with heaven or something and putting it off until the last moment. It should be said, incidentally, that the orchestra itself was in tremendously fine fettle. For euphonious and genuine musical playing the Bostonians are hard to beat.

DENVER, COLO.
EXPRESS
NOV 28 1924

Serge Kouszevietsky, famous Russian conductor, made his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Michael Mordkin is back at the Winter Garden, after an absence of more than a decade.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 1.1 1.25 1.4 1.6 1.8

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

206

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 28 1924

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Koussevitzky, New Conductor, Shows Virile Leadership—'Carmen' at Metropolitan.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The thirty-ninth season in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (Siloti edition) Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The interest of the audience inevitably centered itself on the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who made his first appearance here.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as in other cities of Europe.

Further display of details does not seem essential to the peace of mind of the local music lover. What most of us wish to know is whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the language of the curbstone, is going to stage a come back." And let not Pierre Monteux lose such credit as he should receive. He inherited the orchestra in a lamentable condition and had a long uphill journey. He left it in an excellent state and Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to begin at the beginning.

A Real Commander.

But the best car in the world cannot give a good demonstration in the hands of an incompetent driver. Therefore the news this morning is that a real commander is once more at the head of the Boston forces. Mr. Koussevitzky will not be numbered among the reed dogmas of the baton for the simple reason that he is a virile, forceful and withal an analytical conductor, whose interpretations last evening combined sweep and power with searching insight and broad musical imagination. The program gave him room for an exhibition of his command of styles. The Vivaldi concerto was superbly performed. The orchestra delivered it with breadth of tempi, illuminating clarity and nicely adjusted balance of polyphony and unfailingly beautiful phrasing. The whole composition breathed the breath of life, and never for an instant lost its dignity of progress or its architectural lines.

The "Oberon" overture is a work throbbing with the fervor and gallantry of the romantic movement. The conductor's reading was unquestionably more analytical than those to which this public is accustomed. He made his points openly; but when one had adjusted his mind to this he received the right impression of instrumental splendor and variety of moods. The contrasts of themes and movements were strongly marked, but the spirit of the work was published. And the tonal magnificence of the orchestra was revealed in all its glory.

The Debussy nocturnes served to illustrate the disposition of Mr. Koussevitzky toward the romanticism of modern France and the disclosure was far from being the least interesting contribution to the evening's pleasure. The clouds of Debussy are often gray and foggy. Under the newcomer's baton they resumed their proper character. They were pearly, delicate, gently floating, mysterious. The playing of this number was a masterpiece of gossamer transparency and exquisite finish. The fetes were splendidly festal. The cortege has never been played here with such a masterly development of the long crescendo.

The Locomotive Composition.

The much discussed locomotive composition assumed entirely novel virtues under the director of last night, who first gave it in this country. Mr. Koussevitzky, who had from the beginning shown himself an indefatigable performer of melodic line, delivered thematic traits and pointed instrumental utterances hitherto unperceived, at any rate by this reporter. Honegger's conception is abjectively physical and baldly descriptive, but the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed every bit of its meaning, thereby proving that there was more of it "than the casual spectator would imagine."

It is unnecessary to say more than that while the director's style is picturesque there was no evidence last evening that his pantomime was designed to astonish the public. He was apparently bent on giving his men their entrances and reminding them of the alterations of tempo and the dynamic points he had placed before them at rehearsal. The large audience was unquestionably impressed very favorably by the debut.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 28 192

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitsky made his first appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. The reputation of the musician had preceded him. The hall was filled to capacity with an expectant audience. The orchestra, according to the new rule established by this conductor, tuned off-stage and filed in a few minutes before him. When he appeared Mr. Koussevitsky, who carries himself with uncommon dignity, took a thorough survey of the house before he turned about to begin the concert.

His command of the orchestra, though evidently modified last night by nervousness, has advanced since the writer heard his first concert of the season in Boston. The orchestra, then a splendidly developed organization, has gained materially in sensitiveness and elasticity, in edge and snap, in the capacity to respond instantaneously to the wishes of the leader. The leader himself is a commanding figure, immediately felt on the stage. Perhaps his methods surprised some who had leaped to the conclusion that as a virtuoso conductor Mr. Koussevitsky would rant and rave and gesticulate wildly. On the contrary he was poise and self-restraint personified. He made few, but expressive, at times dramatic gestures. He compelled effects which had a fineness of quality that few orchestras under any leader achieve today—and this with a minimum of visible effort. He carries himself effectively. He has a good back. That is important for a successful conductor—a good back.

The program consisted of the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, as edited by Alexander Siloti; Weber's overture to "Oberon"; two of the Debussy nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," and Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase." The music permitted of a very wide range of expression and style. Mr. Koussevitsky utilized to the full his opportunities. Reading of the Vivaldi concerto was a classic in itself. It was clear, unforced, unexaggerated. The stirings in the slow movement played with 206

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 28 1924

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Koussevitzky, New Conductor, Shows Virile Leadership—'Carmen' at Metropolitan.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The thirty-ninth season in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (Siloti edition) Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The interest of the audience inevitably centered itself on the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who made his first appearance here.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He studied at the Moscow Conservatory and became a professor there. He developed first into a celebrated double bass virtuoso and afterward became a distinguished conductor. He has composed a concerto for double bass and founded a society for the promotion of Russian music in Berlin. He has conducted with great success in Paris and London as well as in other cities of Europe.

Further display of details does not seem essential to the peace of mind of the local music lover. What most of us wish to know is whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the language of the curbstone, is going "to stage a come back." And let not Pierre Monteux lose such credit as he should receive. He inherited the orchestra in a lamentable condition and had a long uphill journey. He left it in an excellent state and Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to begin at the beginning.

A Real Commander.

But the best car in the world cannot give a good demonstration in the hands of an incompetent driver. Therefore the news this morning is that a real commander is once more at the head of the Boston forces. Mr. Koussevitzky will not be numbered among the prima donnas of the baton for the simple reason that he is a virile, forceful and withal an analytical conductor, whose interpretations last evening combined sweep and power with searching insight and broad musical imagination. The program gave him room for an exhibition of his command of styles. The Vivaldi concerto was superbly performed. The orchestra delivered it with breadth of tempi, illuminating clarity and nicely adjusted balance of polyphony and unfailingly beautiful phrasing. The whole composition breathed the breath of life, but never for an instant lost its dignity of progress or its architectural lines.

The "Oberon" overture is a work throbbing with the fervor and gallantry of the romantic movement. The conductor's reading was unquestionably more analytical than those to which this public is accustomed. He made his points openly; but when one had adjusted his mind to this he received the right impression of instrumental splendor and variety of moods. The contrasts of themes and movements were strongly marked, but the spirit of the work was published. And the tonal magnificence of the orchestra was revealed in all its glory.

The Debussy nocturnes served to illustrate the disposition of Mr. Koussevitzky toward the romanticism of modern France and the disclosure was far from being the least interesting contribution to the evening's pleasure. The clouds of Debussy are often gray and foggy. Under the newcomer's baton they resumed their proper character. They were pearly, delicate, gently floating, mysterious. The playing of this number was a masterpiece of gossamer transparency and exquisite finish. The fetes were splendidly festal. The cortege has never been played here with such a masterly development of the long crescendo.

The Locomotive Composition.

The much discussed locomotive composition assumed entirely novel virtue under the director of last night, who first gave it in this country. Mr. Koussevitzky, who had from the beginning shown himself an indefatigable pursuer of melodic line, uncovered thematic traits and pointed instrumental utterances hitherto unperceived, at any rate by this reporter. Mr. Honegger's conception is objectively physical and baldly descriptive, but the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra revealed every jot of its meaning, thereby proving that there was more of it "than the casual spectator would imagine."

It is unnecessary to say more than that while the director's style is picturesque there was no evidence last evening that his pantomime was designed to astonish the public. He was apparently bent on giving his men their entrances and reminding them of the alterations of tempo and the dynamic points he had placed before them at rehearsal. The large audience was unquestionably impressed very favorably by the debut.

NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 28 192

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitsky made his first appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. The reputation of the musician had preceded him. The hall was filled to capacity with an expectant audience. The orchestra, according to the new rule established by this conductor, tuned off-stage and filed in a few minutes before him. When he appeared Mr. Koussevitsky, who carries himself with uncommon dignity, took a thorough survey of the house before he turned about to begin the concert.

His command of the orchestra, though evidently modified last night by nervousness, has advanced since the writer heard his first concert of the season in Boston. The orchestra, then a splendidly developed organization, has gained materially in sensitiveness and elasticity, in edge and snap, in the capacity to respond instantaneously to the wishes of the leader. The leader himself is a commanding figure, immediately felt on the stage. Perhaps his methods surprised some who had leaped to the conclusion that as a virtuoso conductor Mr. Koussevitsky would rant and rave and gesticulate wildly. On the contrary he was poise and self-restraint personified. He made few, but expressive, at times dramatic gestures. He secured effects which had a fineness of quality that few orchestras under any leader achieve today—and this with a minimum of visible effort. He carries himself effectively. He has a good back. That is important for a successful conductor—a good back.

The program consisted of the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, as edited by Alexander Siloti; Weber's overture to "Oberon"; two of the Debussy nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; Honegger's orchestral movement, "Pacific 231," and Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase." The music permitted of a very wide range of expression and style. Mr. Koussevitsky utilized to the full his opportunities. Reading of the Vivaldi concerto was classicism itself. It was clear, unforced, unexaggerated. The strings in the slow movement played "piano" and "pianissimo," not with a tone suggestive of blotting paper, but with vibrancy and sing—with true quality. There was always the sense of proportion and reserve power, which proved one of the outstanding qualities of a concert with a conductor who—rather strangely, as the event proved—had for years been reported as one fond, even at heavy cost, of climaxes. The Vivaldi concerto, as an opening number, is a test for any orchestra, for any conductor. It was passed triumphantly.

A first concert is never one which gives a final estimate of a conductor's powers. He naturally chooses compositions for which he believes he has a particular flare, and which are likely to impress an audience. He is particularly on his metal, and the tension of the occasion, if it is not to his marked disadvantage, is likely to help him with his men and his public. Therefore, conclusive estimates of Mr. Koussevitsky are to be avoided. At the same time the evidence of his first concert in this city is extremely promising. He turned from the classicism of Vivaldi to give a very individual and romantic reading of the Weber overture, one which in its poetry and romanticism would, we believe, have delighted the composer. Not only the strings, but the horn of the opening, sounded magic from far away. There was unprecedented delicacy and diaphonous tone quality. The circus character that most conductors give to the fast movement was avoided, so that even the more theatrical measures of Weber had a beauty that was not of the world and the garish day. And how refreshing it was that this movement did not rush helter-skelter to its conclusion, that the lyrical theme was sung by the strings, and not turned off hand-organ fashion.

[illegible] really in two halves. [illegible] The climax of the first half of the concert came with the music of Debussy and Scriabin, but [illegible] Koussevitzky [illegible] Honegger [illegible] exclusive beauty [illegible] yet attempted, in the Debussy orchestral nocturnes. To play Debussy skilled, but a music is not only technician. There are highly intuitive certain balances, that certain colors precisely indicated, even by careful indications in the score. A hundred times we have heard these extraordinary opening progressions of the wind instruments in the "Nuages" certainly a very quintessence of the rare and incomparable genius of Debussy. Never before had they the precise surface, the clearness, but softness of timber that Mr. Koussevitsky, with the masterly aid of the wind players of the orchestra attained. There was similar fineness of feeling in the English horn solo: it usually stands out, like a black charcoal stroke against a delicately shaded background. Last night this exquisite timber was sketched against the gray of the other instruments as only a deeper intensity that sometimes emerged from and sometimes mingled with them. And this, too, was fortunate; the movement was not dragged, and it was never heavy. This piece, "Clouds," has no weight, no substance at all, and yet there is inherent in the score the miraculous precision of the greatest musical genius that modern France has produced. The whole orchestral color and sonority in these Debussy pieces, a beauty that makes the throat tighten with its poignancy and wonder, was entirely different than in any other performance of the evening. It had almost a volatile essence; if it had been one shade less substantial it would have vanished from hearing. Perhaps this, almost too subtle an achievement for the spaces of Carnegie Hall, was the true artistic climax of the evening.

Honegger's piece is now well known in New York, but it has not been so well interpreted. It had much more musical quality and cumulative development than at previous hearings, and all the notes were played. The beginning was much quieter—a mere whiff of breath from the monster locomotive in repose; it was also more gradual; the climax was reserved until the proper movement, and the broad, massive conclusion gave greatly added dignity and significance to the composition. Scriabine's tone poem, on similar principles, was given a nobler line, and a wider arch than is ordinarily its wont, and the music, with Mr. Krasser, became a veritable rhapsody. It is gorgeous, sensual and sensational too, in its nature; it is nevertheless an emotional expression—with the trumpet theme that mounts intrepidly on wave after wave of orchestral tone—and a perfectly magnificent splotch of color. Mr. Koussevitsky took his tempi more slowly than most and built his climax more carefully. Perhaps his tempi were here a little slow for the somewhat dull acoustics of Carnegie Hall, but they gave the music unusual solidity, and made the final moments the more impressive.

Further concerts will show in more detail the musical individuality of this gifted leader. They may materially modify early impressions of his musicianship. But certainly the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its technical quality and its expressional capacities, has reached a height it had not held for years following the outbreak of the war, and certainly it faces an exceptionally interesting season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald & Tribune
NOV 28 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Koussevitzky Comes to Town; The Famous Russian Leads the Boston Symphony

First subscription concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Vivaldi,
Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ.....(Edited by A. Siloti)
Weber .....Overture to "Oberon"
Debussy.....Two nocturnes for orchestra
(a) "Nuages."
(b) "Fetes."
Honegger......"Pacific, 231"
Intermission.
Scriabin..."Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54

At twenty-one minutes past 8 last night the greatest doublebass player in the world walked rather listlessly onto the stage of Carnegie Hall and stood bowing gravely to an enormous audience stuffed to bursting with anticipatory excitement and cranberry sauce. But the object of all this attention carried neither bow nor viol. The virtuoso of other years, the Casals of the bull fiddle, had long since stored his doublebass and had become the most conspicuous conductor in Europe. For this reserved, distinguished, impeccably tailored figure, who looked as if he were about to plead a corporation case before the Supreme Court instead of conducting an orchestra, was Serge Koussevitzky, come at last to New York.

* * *

It is known of all men hereabouts that Mr. Koussevitzky is the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the admirable Monteux, its late director, having gone the way of all conductorial flesh that proves to be merely grass and does not permit the making of profitable hay by the box office. If the directorate of the Orchestra were at any time anxious as to the outcome of the change, they must long since have flung away their doubts upon the joyful winds of certitude. For Mr. Koussevitzky came to town last night trailing clouds of authentic Boston glory (to say nothing of his European nimbus), heralded by the pæans sung in his praise by the acute reviewers and the seasoned public of that sage and experienced community, which has known masters of the orchestra as variously gifted as Gericke and Nikisch and Muck and Monteux, and is not easily weaned from the milk of tradition. And the directorate must also have had their misgivings concerning our own benighted town set happily at rest: for it is said that Boston Symphony seats are now almost as scarce as they used to be in those fabulous pre-war days when the concerts of the Boston organization were the chief and shining events of our orchestral season.

* * *

Certainly the chairs and standing room at Carnegie Hall could not have been more completely filled than they were last night; and at every point where the polite inexorability of Mr. Koussevitzky would permit—at his entrances and exits and culminations (though not in the brief pauses between movements)—the audience made manifest its enthusiastic approval of the new conductor, who for three years has set musical Europe by the ears. At the end of the concert, after Mr. Koussevitzky had borne them up into Scriabin's perfumed paradise on the frenetically mounting tides of that "Poème de l'Extase" which he so dearly loves to set swirling about susceptible ears, they recalled him repeatedly to the stage. How often we cannot say; for when we left, the quiet, well-groomed, rather melancholy figure was still coming out and bowing gravely to his first New York audience.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky had built his program shrewdly. Of the five numbers on it, three were music of the type with which he deals most happily and with which he has won his principal triumphs as a conductor. That is to say, they were music of our own time, music of the last quarter century. Debussy, Scriabin and Honegger would doubtless, it is true, be strange bedfellows; yet Debussy's "Nocturnes," Scriabin's "Poème de l'Extase" and Honegger's "Pacific" are, in their different ways, music that is close to our contemporary habits of thinking and feeling; and it is with this music that Mr. Koussevitzky has shown himself to be most intimately sympathetic.

Oddly enough, he is also peculiarly responsive to music of an utterly different type—music such as Vivaldi's eighteenth century concerto, with its large simplicity of line and its serene ingenuousness of emotional content; music such as the concerti grossi of Handel and the B minor Suite of Bach which we heard him play last year in Paris with exquisite rightness of tone and felicity of exposition. Those who have raised their eyebrows over Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations have generally had in mind his dealings with the romantic composers of the nineteenth century—the Beethoven of the Seventh Symphony, the Schubert of the "Unfinished," for example. But it could hardly have been more than a coincidence that Mr. Koussevitzky steered clear of such music last night, and came no nearer to Beethoven and Schubert than the "Oberon" overture of Weber; for he has already played Beethoven in Boston, and the Wise Men of the East have rebuked him not.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky has two outstanding traits that make for vividness: he has a dramatizing imagination, and he has a passion for accentuation. Often very often, indeed—this vividness of conception and of treatment produces results of the most memorable sort. We have never, for example, heard that marvelous effect in the middle of Debussy's "Fetes," the sudden mysterious hushing of the music in preparation for the advance of the chimerical procession, more impressively achieved. And in moments like the incandescent climax of Scriabin's "Poème de l'Extase" Mr. Koussevitzky puts over superbly what the music invites him to accomplish.

But too often his passion for italicizing everything has unfortunate results. It seems difficult for Mr. Koussevitzky to allow the music to "breave natural," like the colored lady in the story. If the score calls for a piano passage, Mr. Koussevitzky turns it in a pianissimo that is barely audible. If Weber wishes us to hear the horns of Elfland faintly blowing, Mr. Koussevitzky is not content until the elves have vanished behind the farthest hill. If Weber writes "dance" under the A major clarinet theme in the Allegro of his Overture, Mr. Koussevitzky has his player dawdle over the melody as if it were a languishing Andante. The voluptuous swoonings of Scriabin in his dreams of ecstasy become, under his sympathetic care, merely a series of relaxing naps, wherein the patient rests easily, while the waiting audience stirs restlessly and wonders when the eight horns are going to stand up and bring things to an issue.

* * *

[illegible] the burning intensity of the man. Even when he languishes unduly, as with Scriabin, he languishes through excess of sympathy, not because his own vitality is relaxed. Clarity of conception, quick sensibility, a comprehensive grasp of structure, a fusing and projecting imagination—these virtues are Mr. Koussevitzky's, beyond denial. There are no dead areas in his brain; the whole man is flamingly responsive and alive. Even when you are convinced that he is wrong—even when you are sure that the song was not meant to go that way—you are fain to listen, though you dissent and disapprove. His misconceptions are more engrossing than the accuracies of less fiery and headstrong spirits: for he has genius—misguided and wayward, at times; but unmistakable and authentic, and, at its best, magnificent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
[illegible] 28 1924

Joseph Hilto

Camel's Ha

So luxu
So low

$1.95 an

powers revealed last night was extremely impressive, we shall endeavor to be reasonably cautious and avoid putting all our emotional eggs into one basket until, say, after next Saturday afternoon's concert.

The impression he made last night was all the more profound because he was not playing upon a perfect instrument. The Boston Orchestra, despite Mr. Monteux's heroic labors of the past few years, has not regained the wonderful plasticity and tonal beauty that it had under Karl Muck. The brasses are nicely balanced but a little wanting in richness, the other wind choirs, while they number famous artists in their ranks, lack complete homogeneity, and the strings, clear as they are, remain a little cold in quality.

Only an authentic miracle, of course, would have corrected these shortcomings in the few weeks Mr. Koussevitzky has been in Boston. What he has evidently done is to concentrate his energies upon getting the finest possible playing out of the orchestra under his hand, reserving radical efforts to refine the instrument itself for a time of greater leisure.

And it was extraordinary playing that he coaxed from his men last night. "Coaxed" is perhaps not a just term, for he has little of Mr. Mengelberg's air of genial persuasiveness. On the other hand, his is not at all parade-ground discipline of Karl Muck. He is tall, well built, neither slim nor portly, and bears a faint facial resemblance to Josef Hofmann. If he is to be compared with any conductor it should probably be with Leopold Stokowsky. Both men handle an audience and an orchestra with the same air of unassertive, slightly aloof, but absolutely confident authority.

Mr. Koussevitzky's beat is angular and decisive, and must be easy to follow. In quiet passages he beats almost entirely from the wrist, in a very small arc, widening the arc and using his full arm only in moments of stress. His most individual gesture is to thrust his left arm sharply overhead, the palm of the hand flat, to indicate a sudden pianissimo (a dynamic change of which he seems very fond). Although his conducting is always electric with energy, his practice of keeping both feet firmly planted and his body motionless gives an impression of fundamental poise and complete self-mastery.

The first half of last night's program, whether intentionally so or not, was perfectly adapted to exhibiting samples of his ability in various styles of music. There was the Vivaldi D minor concerto, with organ—archeoclassic; Weber's overture to "Oberon"

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 28 1924

MUSIC OF THE DAY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Serge Koussewitsky, gave its first concert this season at Carnegie Hall last evening. For the program Mr. Koussewitsky had selected Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra with Organ in D minor (edited by Siloti), Weber's Overture to "Oberon," two Debussy orchestral Nocturnes, Honegger's "Pacific 231," and the "Poeme de l'Extase" of Scriabine.

Much has been heard in New York of this new conductor. His coming to the Boston orchestra has had wide publicity of a sort that could not be overlooked. The eminent position which Koussewitsky holds abroad, the success and fame of his in Paris and in London, have become matters of popular legend, as have the Russian's marked modernistic tendencies. Boston reports reflect the favorable attitude of Europe—Mr. Koussewitsky's success was well assured long before he stepped on the platform of Carnegie Hall last evening at 8:15 o'clock.

No doubt he did fine things, far finer things than New York is accustomed to in an orchestral way. A conductor whose imagination has the quality of genius, he infuses into the performance of the orchestra more than an added dash of enthusiasm. His readings have an infinite elasticity, a new and surprising novelty, even in such a familiar concert piece as the "Oberon" overture. The band is in his hand; his authority is manifest in the spirit of the performance, in the quality of the playing, both in whole groups of instruments, and in individual cases. The Vivaldi Concerto revealed a balance and unity in the strings that the Boston Orchestra has not had since the days of Karl Muck—that quality which is referred to when the lady to one's right finds the twenty first violinists playing and sounding "like one great fiddle."

Mr. Koussewitsky and his band come to Brooklyn this evening, repeating several of the numbers on their initial program and adding other new ones. A more exhaustive analysis of his individuality as a conductor can then be made. The Vivaldi Concerto, however, was a thing of broad and majestic line in the first two movements and of sure vivacity in the finale. In Honegger's "Pacific" Mr. Koussewitsky's feeling for detail, his skill at bringing out the separate orchestral voices with clarity and transparency was strikingly evident. For the first time, we were made aware of the structural perfection of Honegger's music, its inevitable logic, its truly architectural mass. We also got from Koussewitsky a greater impression of rhythmic motion, and the song of the mechanical giant that wells up to such a great climax was brought out with overpowering force and beauty. The Debussy and the Scriabine we shall hear again this evening, and shall comment upon them in our review of the Academy concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 28 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY IN DEBUT AS CONDUCTOR

Directs Boston Orchestra at Its First Concert of Season in Carnegie Hall.

For the first time in some seven years, people looked around at one another last night in Carnegie Hall with a new sort of expression in their faces. The affair was the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The resigned look of prospective boredom with which they had been greeting one another through the successive regimes of all the messieurs conductors since Herr Doktor Muck got so tangled up in The Star Spangled Banner, was gone. Taking its place was one of extremely lively expectancy. For the Frenchmen had departed and a Russian was in the saddle—or at least, on the podium. He is Serge Koussevitzky and enough tongue-wagging had been going on about him for the past year or so to have raised a pitiful subscription to a sold-out house. Pretty much every one who considers himself anyone was among those present.

And Mr. Koussevitzky was no disappointment. Whatever one is likely to say about him as a conductor in the course of the Winter (and probably for a number of Winters to come), comment will certainly exclude anything approaching a charge of ennui. He is, indeed, the kind of musical personality for whom the adjective galvanic should have been invented even if it wasn't. He is always electric in the way he does things, and whether you invariably agree with him or not, you very unstintedly admit that he is a vital personality.

Last night's great audience certainly thought so. It gave the conductor a graciously exuberant preliminary welcome when he first appeared before his men, and afterward doubled it or thereabouts when it had had this first evening's sample of his quality. Henceforth you are going to have about as much difficulty getting tickets for a Boston Orchestra concert as you have been having for those of Mr. Stokowski's band from Philadelphia. The slightly lamento look that has been lurking in the eyes of the amiable Mr. Brennan, who manages the Bostonians, was replaced last night by something completely triomfo.

Mr. Koussevitzky, both during the early season in Boston and in his concerts in Paris and London, has shown himself to have very firm convictions about the value of modernist music, and there was a considerable splash of it on this first programme of his. It included Debussy (who may, however, already be a neo-classic), Arthur Honegger and Scriabin—the two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," of the first; Honegger's much talked about "Pacific 231," and the Russian's "Poeme de l'extase." These followed an unfamiliar, if not wholly unknown concerto by Vivaldi and the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

One's ruminations concerning a new orchestral conductor, at least a more or less compelling one, are likely on first acquaintance to be no more certain or definite than one's cogitations after meeting an alert and attractive woman. The conductor, like the lady, leaves certain impressions which may either shift colorfully back and forth, or simply deepen as time goes on.

Our first impression of Mr. Koussevitzky is this—that he is temperamentally a superbly literal interpreter of music. By that we don't mean in the least that either imagination or fancy are absent from what he does; quite the contrary—merely that his fancy and his imaginative impulses run to rather a precise, sometimes even neat, exposition of what he has in hand—or at least, what he had last night. His revelation of music is, so to say, sculpturesque; it is carved out with a marvelous and at times stunning clarity, it stands forth in the highest relief. But it nearly always remains a bit stony.

And yet the way he played the introduction to the "Oberon" overture confounds us here considerably. For it was as beautifully played as we have ever heard it done. It made you believe in fairies a thousand times more securely than the saccharine barrieism of "Peter Pan," for instance. It was the land of faery with the "e" instead of the "i." The rest of the piece was more forthright and brilliantly conventional, but stirring just the same. The house rose to it more than to anything else of the evening.

We may say that Koussevitsky's performance of the Honegger locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," was really its first performance here, although Mr. Walter Damrosch and his orchestra had already played it (Mr. Damrosch, in fact, has been snitching a good deal of the Koussevitzky programme thunder). But even as magnificently set forth as it was last night, it still finds us one of the dissenters concerning its effectiveness in the light of what it sets out to do. We still believe that it merely gives an adumbration of the romance in its subject, and makes its point through mere simulative suggestion and the association of ideas in noise and noise.

The conductor, it seemed to us, disclosed his weak spot in the Debussy nocturnes. The first of them, "Clouds," is one of the most beautiful things in music, and one of the subtlest. Debussy here is a companion of Monet. The floating cloud picture of an evening sky is given a soul. The music should flood senses and feeling with its flowing mood. And last night its revery and its flow were literalized, broken up, brought down to earth. Moreover, its companion piece, "Festivals," which also is a dream of such things was trumpeted about like a night of revelry on Montmartre.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" was evidently Mr. Koussevitzky's intended third-act climax, and he made it as nearly convincing as we have ever heard it done. Alberic Coates, who sat at the feet of Scriabin, alone has made it more impressive. But in spite of all Mr. Koussevitzky's gargantuan labors over it, he could not hide its essential poverty, its wholesale obsession with other men's ideas, its Straussian complex, and its aesthetic falsity—for ecstacy is something too wise to be lengthy and too intense to permit of longueurs.

—L. W.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From NOV 28 1924
Telegram
New York City

Koussevitzky Primo Uomo.

Serge Koussevitsky, the gentleman who "hypnotizes an audience and sometimes an orchestra," conducted his first local concert, which was likewise the first local concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, in Carnegie Hall last evening. The appearance of the much-heralded Russian attracted such an audience as no Boston Symphony concert has drawn in our town for several years except when "Le Sacre du Printemps" was repeated last March.

Yesterday's program consisted of a concerto for orchestra and organ in D minor, composed by Vivaldi and edited by Alexander Sliotl; Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes," Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'extase."

Whether or not Mr. Koussevitsky deserves to be called a prima donna of the baton, this is distinctly a prima donna list. On no other ground could such a concatenation of heterogeneous pieces be explained. One thinks of a Melba with her "Sweet Bird," mad scene of Ophelie, "Se saran rose" waltz and "Home, Sweet Home." But let us not cavil at Mr. Koussevitsky's program for his first conducting in New York.

The performance of Vivaldi's fine concerto yesterday was characterised by clean playing and sharp rhythm—the former we naturally expect from the Boston Symphony and the latter has always been one of Mr. Koussevitzky's assets. But the performance was conspicuously without shading. One listened in vain for a real piano, for a controlled crescendo. The first violins, too, tended to overcrow the other strings in passages where their part called for no special prominence.

Doubtless the conductor was nervous in this number and determined to obliterate any shortcomings by treating the illimitably familiar overture to a "reading." There's no mistake about his achieving his end! The first faint horn call was an evocation that promised all things, but alas, after it came no elfland or Bagdad! The reading was undeniably dramatic, but it drained the music of all its buoyant romance. Clarinet or fiddles sang the theme of Huon's chivalric air as if it were the sappiest sob song of the music halls, and Rezia's answering melody was all done up in pink and blue ribbons like a mid-Victorian bon-bon box. The ending was as rowdy as a charivari.

The Debussy nocturnes were no less personal. Mr. Koussevitzky took "Nuages" (with its opening theft from "Boris") at a brisk and healthy pace which blew the film of mists far, far away, leaving a cloud picture as clear and precise as a steel engraving. You saw every individual drop of moisture; you almost knew each cloud by number and name. The "Fetes," on the other hand, Mr. Koussevitzky took slowly. The procession that crosses the festivities moved like a dirge, but with the clash and thunder of a battle.

Thereafter the visiting conductor trod ground that is more peculiarly his own. He led the original performance of Honegger's locomotive piece, and it is only natural that he should present it here in a peculiarly favorable light. The performance yesterday showed forth vividly and impressively the masterly structure of this piece. It brought eloquently to light the triumphant melos of the brasses, scarcely suspected in previous performances. The broadening of the tempo toward the end imparted a weight and majesty to the conclusion of the engine's run that its other spins through New York had lacked. Not great music, but extremely clever, and this time really played.

Scriabin is recognized as Mr. Koussevitsky's field of glory. Although the Boston orchestra at no time last evening played quite at the top of its form, I would, with that reservation, admit cheerfully that a more eloquent exposition of the "Poem of Ecstasy" were an impossibility, provided I never have to sit through its pretentious, empty bombast again, though conducted by Arch-Hierophant Koussevitzky or the god Apollo himself!

There is no doubt that Mr. Koussevitzky is an interesting and magnetic conductor. His treatment of detail shows insight and imagination even when his conception of a piece in its entirety may be, to the best of the hearer's belief, profoundly mistaken. There is no doubt that he can have his will with an orchestra and his way with an audience. But there seems to be no doubt also that "readings" are the very core of his art. Despite a torch-like upward thrust of his left arm and hand, supplementing his decisive right, Mr. Koussevitzky is sparing of gesture, as conductors go these days. Still one could hardly imagine him standing motionless throughout the scherzo of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, letting the hand conduct itself, as Dr. Muck did once.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
NOV 28 1924

Music Ernest Newman's Daily Column

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S program last night may possibly have been designed to destroy at once the absurd legend that has somehow got about that he is only a sensational conductor. He began with a piece of the purest classicism,—a Vivaldi concerto in D minor—and played it in a style that nobody could deny was of classical purity. It was a trying opening, for the great, serene lines of the work demand from the conductor not only a perfect plastic sense but the most absolute control. As it happens, control, which the merely sensational conductor always lacks, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's strongest points; and no one who heard the strings of the orchestra phrase the long-drawn-out melody of the adagio could doubt that here was a conductor who, however deeply he may feel a piece of music, however thoroughly he may be immersed in it, yet paradoxically stands right outside it, seeing it as a sculptor sees a statue, and modelling it as a sculptor models.

In the "Oberon" overture and the "Nuages" and "Fetes" of Debussy we had another Koussevitzky,—a water color painter, a lover of soft lines and delicate washes. He tuned the orchestra down, in the prelude to the "Oberon," to the finest pianissimo imaginable, yet within the pianissimo were a dozen degrees of depth of tint. In his phrasing of the clarinet melody some of his listeners may have felt their first impulse to disagree with him. The pace may have been rather slow for some tastes; it was certainly slower than most conductors allow themselves at this point. But here, as on other similar occasions, Mr. Koussevitzky plays the operatic overture with his mind intent on the opera itself. The clarinet melody he fills with all the emotion of the scene in which it appears; and his slow tempo has the advantage that in the later stages of the overture the theme and what grows out of it can be made to express a very dramatic acceleration of the pulse. Granting Mr. Koussevitzky's premises, every later stage of the argument follows with an irresistible logic.

The "Nuages" always leaves one a little unsatisfied, partly, no doubt, because it is so like Moussorgsky that one feels it is not out-and-out Debussy. But the color sense of it is consummate. Unfortunately the performance of it, that was equally consummate, was in large part spoiled by an attack of bronchial catarrh all over the house. The psychologist, rather than the physiologist, must be left to explain why it is that a delicate pianissimo always brings on this kind of thing, while a prolonged fortissimo leaves the human throat unrasped. It was in the "Fetes"—the high-water mark of Debussy's genius—that we had the most exquisite playing of the evening. Here, if anywhere in music, a composer has managed to get what painters call aerial perspective; and in last night's superb performance this was realized with a delicacy and certainty that left one amazed. It was not alone that the curious centerpiece that Debussy himself described as a procession passing through the main texture of the fete and being at once distinct from it and blended with it was shown so clearly as a sort of pictorial "inset"—for, after all, Debussy's cunning orchestration has provided for that—but that the whole work really suggested that "luminous dust" that the composer aimed at painting in tones.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" formed an amusing interlude between the more serious things. Mr. Koussevitzky's keen sense of orchestral values enabled him to put a delicious realism into what are the best parts of the work,—indeed, the only parts that one wants to hear very often—the first dozen or twenty bars and the last. The cleverness of the scoring here is diabolical. Art, as usual, has gone one better than nature; no locomotive that ever lived could come near Honegger's orchestra in suggesting the starting of a huge engine, the grinding and whistling of axles slowly settling down to their work, the gradual coming of the feeling of its mighty strength into the limbs of the driver. But the work excels purely musical [illegible] this effect he becomes com-

Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy" has always been one of the works in which Mr. Koussevitzky has excelled. In few works can we study so completely his union of perfection of detail with a steady, unrelaxing grasp of the whole. But his performance of the "Poem of Ecstasy" is unconsciously cruel to the work. It shows it up for what it is,—a long aphrodisiac convulsion. I know that Scriabine regarded it as an essay in pantheist-theosophist philosophy; but the true sub-title for it would be "Confessions of an Erotic Flapper." To analyze it psychologically as it ought to be analyzed is impossible in a respectable newspaper; it could be done only in a medical journal devoted to the spicier problems of psychiatry. But though the substance of the work is obscene, technically it is a masterpiece. It makes its effect by an endless series of harmonic startings that are always checked just on the verge of realization. It is this that makes the work so hard a problem for the conductor; he has to convey to the hearer the sense of still pressing on and on through each of these momentary setbacks. Mr. Koussevitzky makes us conscious of the one big line embracing it all.

Philharmonic Concert

Until Wednesday night I had not heard the "Pathetic" symphony for seven or eight years: I had given up listening to it, because the star conductors made it sob and wail and shudder so disgustingly that one's stomach rose at the indecent exhibition. But as I still kept a secret liking for the work, which is not only the very essence of Tchaikovski but the supreme summing up of the pessimism of the Romantics, it was a pleasure to hear it again, and a double pleasure to hear it in so masterly a performance as that of Mr. Van Hoogstraten and the Philharmonic Society's orchestra. Mr. Van Hoogstraten did all that was necessary to bring out the gloom and despair of the work, but never too much; while the playing of the or-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
NOV 28 1924

Surveying Skriabin

At Mr, Koussevitsky's first concerts in Boston, last October, his audiences heard Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." At his concerts next week they will listen to Skriabin's "Divine Poem." For interlude, a paragraph by Mr. Gilman about this music may slip into reprint. It is quoted from the New York Herald-Tribune: "Forget, for a moment, the voluptuous and gorgeous instrumentation of the 'Poem of Ecstasy' and look at the musical ideas that it clothes so splendidly. They are almost as banal, as trite, as sweetly sentimental, as if they had sprung from the bonbon eroticism of Gounod at his worst—a Gounod who has become just a little drunk on Eau de Tristan. The biting hyenas and stinging, lovesick snakes that Skriabin saw in his lyrico-poetic hasheesh dreams have become merely pretty ladies from chocolate-box covers; but Skriabin, unaware of their frailty, has blown them up by the wind of his hysterical ecstasies to superhuman, to monstrous, size. They scream and rant in the pages of his finale with what their creator thought was mystic ecstasy, but which sounds to us pathetically like hifalutin' bombast. That portentous theme which Skriabin's trumpets blare out as if he thought it would lift him into the sensuous heaven of his dreams, sounds more and more like a sort of cosmic salon music every time we hear it."

Programs in Prospect

At the first of the supplementary concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting and Miss Dusolina Gianinni assisting singer.

Overture to the Opera, "Oberon".....Weber
Air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Suite from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," Orchestral Movement, "Pacific, 231".....de Falla
Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.....Honegger
.....Beethoven

At the third of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, in Sanders Theater, at Cambridge next Thursday evening, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting:

Symphony in G minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Scythian Suite.....Prokofiev
Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Fêtes".....Debussy chestra was a constant joy for its understanding and precision.

The only other purely orchestral work was Rachmaninov's "Isle of the Dead,"—a fine conception, admirably worked out, though I cannot quite reconcile myself to the treatment of the "Dies Iræ"; it is tantalizing to have only a fragment of the great, gaunt melody given us time after time. Here again the performance set the work in the best possible light.

Medtner's playing in the fourth piano concerto of Beethoven was of the kind I should have expected from my knowledge of him as a composer. Its powerful intellectuality, its disdain of all softness of line and of accent, might not please every one, but I personally felt the same mingled liking and respect for it that I do for Medtner's music. I must confess, however, to an almost irresistible longing for his blood during the cadenza in the first movement; it was so completely out of keeping not only with Beethoven but with the style of Beethoven's period that it was difficult to understand how so fine an artist could bring himself to play it.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

208

NEW YORK HEARS BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR

Another "Ball-Room" Series—Finck's "Musical Laughs"—Plaza Matinees Popular—Lowell Sherman Talks at Musicale

Emilie Frances Bauer, 310 W. 94th Street. Phone: 4048 Riverside.

The excitement of the week was caused by the first New York appearance of Serge Koussevitzky heading the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Russian conductor arrived at the psychological moment, just as a few years ago the Philadelphia organization stepped into the breach made by the debacle of the old Boston Symphony. The orchestra has had a strenuous pull since that time, and the admirable body of players which Koussevitzky found upon his arrival was the creation of Pierre Monteux. The brilliancy, resiliency and plasticity of the orchestra were the result of the driving force of the man at the helm, plus the virtuosity of the orchestra to which he fell heir. He made his entrance before a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall. The new conductor revels in strong contrasts, and he loves to start a great sweep in a pianissimo almost inaudible. America has been awaiting a modernist of strong colors, but when the program was concluded few would have disputed that the finest thing he did was the concerto for orchestra with organ by Vivaldi. The classicality of the number in his virile hands was delightful. This was followed by the overture to Weber's "Oberon," filmy, lace-like, but at times very deliberate. Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" led him into the present, for there is enough that is still fresh in Debussy to call him modern even in a day of Honegger's "Pacific." The modern Frenchman was perhaps the more interesting for the several hearings that this "231" engine has had. Certain it is that the new conductor brought the engine straight from the front and the energy with which it seemed to tear along was almost exhausting. He gave one the sense of the monster bearing down upon one helplessly. It was received with great cheers and Koussevitzky found himself established in the musical life of New York with his first program. His closing number was the Scriabin "Poeme de l'extase," which is no longer forbidding as it was a few years ago. It seemed almost genial writing, perhaps for some—simple. It sounded simple as read by the Russian.

But for the closing number, the Brahms fourth symphony, the Saturday afternoon program was devoted entirely to the countrymen of Koussevitzky; perhaps because he knew them well enough to want his audiences to share his appreciation, or perhaps because he thought it was expected of him. It goes without saying that Koussevitzky finds all the glow of the semi-Oriental coloring, all the weird effects and all the opportunities for expansion that most of these numbers offered. Most of the numbers which only now are coming into their own had been presented in New York, some of them long ago by Modest Altschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra. Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" is an old friend, none the less welcome as played by the band from Boston. Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khowantchina" is, as most of this composer's music, strongly tinged with folk tunes and it showed to admirable advantage the fine woodwind and reed choir of the orchestra. Another excerpt from a Russian opera based, as is most of the literature of this type on a fairy tale, was "Flight of the Bumble Bee" from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" was new in New York but it had been played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock in 1918. The demonstrations for the new conductor were long and loud. At the Saturday afternoon concert, Jan. 3, Rachmaninoff will be the soloist. It was with Rachmaninoff in London some twenty-four or six years ago that Koussevitzky emerged from the light of contrabass soloist to that of conductor in a program devoted to Tschaikowsky and Rachmaninoff and his success then was emphatic

* * *

Many pe[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 29 192

The big conductor contest is on. The Philadelphia Orchestra already sells out here with Mr. Stokowsky as drawing card; the Boston Symphony, offering as leader Serge Koussevitzky, one of Europe's favorites, sees the local populace storming the walls, a return to the fruitful period of a decade ago; the New York Symphony will bring back Bruno Walter presently, further to arouse its patrons, while the Philharmonic, not content with promising us this year Wilhelm Furtwaengler, eminent German leader, and the renowned Stravinsky himself, in addition to the fully competent and masterful Mengelberg, upsets the entire conductor cosmos by announcing that the temperamental Toscanini will again be among us in January, 1926. Somebody will have to write some new music to accommodate this array of talent. With so much conducting genius loose people cannot be expected to rest content with Brahms and Beethoven symphonies, a few Strauss tone poems, a limited supply of old classics and the New Russians.

After but one session of Mr. Koussevitzky we feel sure he is a likely member of the conductor squad and he will eventually make the team. Indeed he may become its Captain. The dormant musical muse, stirred by what the Boston leader found in the somewhat empty Scriabine "Poem of Extasy," leaped itself in ecstacy to this extent:

The Russian conduc, Koussevitzky,
He out for America litzky;
His art was not lost on
The folks up in Boston,
And now in New York he's a hitsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY—

Serge Koussevitzky won prolonged ovations last evening as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the opera house at the Academy of Music. Hailed as the greatest European conductor when he recently came to this country, he immediately gained the confidence and enthusiastic welcome of an audience that packed the famous hall, an audience that is usually seen there at operatic performances.

Not only did Brooklyn society pay tribute to the man who will undoubtedly gain increased renown as the season continues, but, representatives of Brooklyn's music and art world were heard to express glowing commendations of the conductor. Among the prominent musicians seen in the opera house were: Conductor Willem Von Hoogstraten, Professor Hall, manager of the "Messiah," which will soon be presented in the same house, and R. Huntington Woodman, famous organist.

Frank L. Babbott, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, was there. Arthur S. Somers, president of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, heartily approved of the leadership of the conductor.

What perhaps is most striking in Mr. Koussevitzky's skilful guidance of the baton, is his unusual ease, showing that he clearly understands each theme, has confidence in himself and in his players. He did not make many dramatic gestures, but those that he occasionally did make were expressive and unusually forceful. Throughout the four selections he was calm, passive, and quick in his movements, but, assuredly, he drew music from his orchestra, as, it may well be said, one of the grandest concerts that ever resounded through that grand hall was heard last evening. Throughout the concert he was reserved and straight like a stalwart leader who guides his men to certain victory.

The program, containing four selections, was varied. Two of them were played Thursday evening when Mr. Koussevitzky for the first time conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

Beginninig with Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," opus 9, the master of the baton showed his audience the fire and gusto he could produce from his players.

Debussy's "Two Nosturnes" came next. "Nuages" and "Fetts," the former noted for its softness of tone, its mellow sweetness, and the latter for its spirit of brilliancy and joyous effervescence. Then the exquisiteness of the music of Debussy, the touching melody of "Nuages" were at their best. It was after this part of the program that Mr. Koussevi.zky was so warmly applauded, and it then became a recognized fact that the conductor had indeed made himself truly acceptable to the Brooklyn lovers of good music.

"Le Poeme de l'Extase," Scriabin's marvelous tone poem of rhapsody, came next. Applause after applause greeted the conductor after this selection.

The last number was Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Opus 67." The "Andante con mote" was the most impressive part of this symphony. It was a selection of beauteaus sweetness filled with delightful pianissimos.

This was the first in a series of five philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, and, if the reception by such a representative Brooklyn audience is to be taken as a criterion, it may well be said that the European conductor will continue gaining his laurels here.

NEW YORK
POST
NOV 29 1924

Boston Symphony Concert Today

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play in Carnegie Hall at 2:30 o'clock this afternoon. An error in the advertising columns gave the time as tomorrow afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 29 19

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, made his bow to Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last evening. It was, according to prophecy, a bow quite as successful as that which he made to Manhattan's public on Thursday. For the program, he had selected to repeat the Overture to "Oberon," the Debussy Nocturnes, Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and to substitute Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the Vivaldi Concerto and Honegger's "Pacific 231."

It is a deserved success that Koussewitsky enjoys, for he is undoubtedly the most dynamic personality to preside over an orchestra in New York for many years. His command of the players is immediately evident in the quiet, yet forceful manner in which he directs, in the dignity of his bearing, and in the extraordinary results which he obtains. The opinion somehow got about—it was a matter of newspaper report and musical gossip—that Koussewitsky was in his way a sort of Strawinsky of the baton, a conscienceless modernist, a dramatic Zeus of orchestral destiny, whose only weapons were thunderbolt. In Paris last spring he conducted a concert of Strawinsky's works, "Sacre du Printemps," the Piano Concerto, "Petrouschka," and other pieces, and from this much was deduced. Yet Koussewitsky is also devoted to the classics, a master of them.

He is not a melodramatic conductor—his originality consists only of a sensitive temperament, which compels him to interpret works rather than merely to read them. And his interpretations, while different from any with which we are familiar, do not arrest by reason of eccentricity, for they possess a compelling logic, a new freshness which adds to our enjoyment of music long familiar.

It was last evening as if we were hearing the "Oberon" Overture for the first time. It is hard to recall so delicate a pianissimo as that which Koussewitsky achieved in the opening bars. The tone of the horn was hardly above a whisper, yet it was smooth, round and penetrated the house. The answer in the strings was replete with elfin suggestion, delicate and spirited. Koussewitsky moulds his phrases with nothing short of genius—the performance was detailed, yet a compact whole.

Debussy's two Nocturnes were the climax of the evening. The first, "Nuage," had exactly the right quality of bleakness—it reminded one of certain paintings by Nicholas Roerich with their cold cloud-covered skies. Not only was the balance maintained with perfection in the wind groups, but the timbre of the English horn, of the oboe and the flutes seemed to acquire a magic suggestiveness. The whole was a delicate painting in tones probably very close to what Debussy attempted to suggest in his notes: "a grey agony, tinged with white."

In the phantasmal procession that moves through the distance in "Fetes" Koussewitsky achieved extraordinary effects. The first distant fanfare of trumpets actually did have the suggestion of something unreal and far off. The climax, as the procession draws nearer, was less fine—it was too loud, in great contrast to the fine pianissimo preceding it. The entire Nocturne was perhaps a bit emphatic in its outlines, lacking some of the shimmer, the dreamlike quality which it has had under other conductors.

For his reading of Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase," Koussewitsky has won much applause. Certainly if anything could be done to make this music sound like more than a theosophical Liszt, he has done it. The phrases are moulded in voluptuous waves, the music comes from the orchestra in ever increasing billows of sound—it has even a certain majesty, and the climax is truly terrific. The component parts of Scriabin's poem are merged into a plastic, inevitable whole under Koussewitsky's hands. However, this hardly compensates for the platitudes that it contains. Its ecstasy is cheap, tasteless, and Scriabin as we come to know him better seems orchestrally to have been the composer of one representative work, the "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire."

The Beethoven Symphony was a remarkable piece of work. Koussewitsky sees it as a thing of classic line, full of dramatic portent, at times threatening, at times, as in the Andante, consoling. He gives it to us in large, Beethovian masses, but masses in which the detail is endless and exquisitely done. The Scherzo, with its awesome pianissimo entrance into the Finale, has never had quite the effect that it had last evening. It can do longer be said, after Thursday's Vivaldi and last evening's Beethoven, that Koussewitsky is unsympathetic to classics, for he expends upon them the same care and intelligence that he brings to the modern music he has placed before us.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
RECORD
NOV 29 1924

George Arliss Back

Serge Koussevietsky, famous Russian conductor, made his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Michael Mordkin is back at the Winter Garden after an absence of more than a decade.

[illegible] BOOKS RECEIVED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 29 1924

Serge Koussevitzky Makes Boro Debut at Academy

Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his Brooklyn debut last night at the Academy of Music before a capacity house of representative Brooklynites. Man ymusicians wehre also in the audience to hear what the newcomer had to give in the way of innocations and interpretations.

What Mr. Koussevitsky did was to repeat his success of the previous evening, when he made his debut at Carneige Hall. He played at least three of the same numbers last night. The symphony of the program was, however, Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, by Beethoven, which he rendered, as the word got about, as though it were written yesterday. That is true of all Mr. Koussevitzky's work. He conducts in an entirely individual way. From the moment he walks containedl yand slowly from the wings and acknowledges the applause of his audience with careful dignity to the moment he drops his arms after the last great chord one is conscious that a new personality is before one from whom to expect new things.

The first four numbers on the program could hardly be said to be blood cousins, for they were "The Roman Carnival," overture, by Berlioz; two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," by Debussy, and "Le Poeme de l'Extase," by Scriabin. But in the handling d teach the characteristics of Koussevitzky's readings and his personality could be felt. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a "jumpy" conductor. His movements seem to have taken on some of the easy river swing of the Russian river on which he is said to have gone from town to town giving chance concerts. His tempo is slowed up to that of an unhurried river between wide banks that seeks the sea in a gradual way. And the scope, quietness and underlying power of the music he brings from his musicians is easily a part of this river symbol.

In all, Mr. Koussevitzky has brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a new period of greatness an dto new interest in the public eye. More than that, he has brought an added store of interpretation to the music of the symphony orchestra.

208

NEW YORK HEARS BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR

Another "Ball-Room" Series—Finck's "Musical Laughs"—Plaza Matinees Popular—Lowell Sherman Talks at Musicale

Emilie Frances Bauer, 310 W. 94th Street. Phone: 4048 Riverside.

The excitement of the week was caused by the first New York appearance of Serge Koussevitzky heading the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Russian conductor arrived at the psychological moment, just as a few years ago the Philadelphia organization stepped into the breach made by the debacle of the old Boston Symphony. The orchestra has had a strenuous pull since that time, and the admirable body of players which Koussevitzky found upon his arrival was the creation of Pierre Monteux. The brilliancy, resiliency and plasticity of the orchestra were the result of the driving force of the man at the helm, plus the virtuosity of the orchestra to which he fell heir. He made his entrance before a capacity audience at Carnegie Hall. The new conductor revels in strong contrasts, and he loves to start a great sweep in a pianissimo almost inaudible. America has been awaiting a modernist of strong colors, but when the program was concluded few would have disputed that the finest thing he did was the concerto for orchestra with organ by Vivaldi. The classicality of the number in his virile hands was delightful. This was followed by the overture to Weber's "Oberon," filmy, lace-like, but at times very deliberate. Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" led him into the present, for there is enough that is still fresh in Debussy to call him modern even in a day of Honegger's "Pacific." The modern Frenchman was perhaps the more interesting for the several hearings that this "231" engine has had. Certain it is that the new conductor brought the engine straight from the front and the energy with which it seemed to tear along was almost exhausting. He gave one the sense of the monster bearing down upon one helplessly. It was received with great cheers and Koussevitzky found himself established in the musical life of New York with his first program. His closing number was the Scriabin "Poeme de l'extase," which is no longer forbidding as it was a few years ago. It seemed almost genial writing, perhaps for some—simple. It sounded simple as read by the Russian.

But for the closing number, the Brahms fourth symphony, the Saturday afternoon program was devoted entirely to the countrymen of Koussevitzky; perhaps because he knew them well enough to want his audiences to share his appreciation, or perhaps because he thought it was expected of him. It goes without saying that Koussevitzky finds all the glow of the semi-Oriental coloring, all the weird effects and all the opportunities for expansion that most of these numbers offered. Most of the numbers which only now are coming into their own had been presented in New York, some of them long ago by Modest Altschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra. Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" is an old friend, none the less welcome as played by the band from Boston. Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khowantchina" is, as most of this composer's music, strongly tinged with folk tunes and it showed to admirable advantage the fine woodwind and reed choir of the orchestra. Another excerpt from a Russian opera based, as is most of the literature of this type on a fairy tale, was "Flight of the Bumble Bee" from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" was new in New York but it had been played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock in 1918. The demonstrations for the new conductor were long and loud. At the Saturday afternoon concert, Jan. 3, Rachmaninoff will be the soloist. It was with Rachmaninoff in London some twenty-four or six years ago that Koussevitzky emerged from the light of contrabass soloist to that of conductor in a program devoted to Tschaikowsky and Rachmaninoff and his success then was emphatic.

* * *

Many pe[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 29 1[illegible]

The big conductor contest is on. The Philadelphia Orchestra already sells out here with Mr. Stokowsky as drawing card; the Boston Symphony, offering as leader Serge Koussevitzky, one of Europe's favorites, sees the local populace storming the walls, a return to the fruitful period of a decade ago; the New York Symphony will bring back Bruno Walter presently, further to arouse its patrons, while the Philharmonic, not content with promising us this year Wilhelm Furtwaengler, eminent German leader, and the renowned Stravinsky himself, in addition to the fully competent and masterful Mengelberg, upsets the entire conductor cosmos by announcing that the temperamental Toscanini will again be among us in January, 1926. Somebody will have to write some new music to accommodate this array of talent. With so much conducting genius loose people cannot be expected to rest content with Brahms and Beethoven symphonics, a few Strauss tone poems, a limited supply of old classics and the New Russians.

After but one session of Mr. Koussevitzky we feel sure he is a likely member of the conductor squad and he will eventually make the team. Indeed he may become its Captain. The dormant musical muse, stirred by what the Boston leader found in the somewhat empty Scriabine "Poem of Extasy," leaped itself in ecstacy to this extent:

The Russian conduc, Koussevitzky,
He out for America litzky;
His art was not lost on
The folks up in Boston,
And now in New York he's a hitsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky won prolonged ovations last evening as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the opera house at the Academy of Music. Hailed as the greatest European conductor when he recently came to this country, he immediately gained the confidence and enthusiastic welcome of an audience that packed the famous hall, an audience that is usually seen there at operatic performances.

Not only did Brooklyn society pay tribute to the man who will undoubtedly gain increased renown as the season continues, but, representatives of Brooklyn's music and art world were heard to express glowing commendations of the conductor. Among the prominent musicians seen in the opera house were: Conductor Willem Von Hoogstraten, Professor Hall, manager of the "Messiah," which will soon be presented in the same house, and R. Huntington Woodman, famous organist.

Frank L. Babbott, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, was there. Arthur S. Somers, president of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, heartily approved of the leadership of the conductor.

What perhaps is most striking in Mr. Koussevitzky's skilful guidance of the baton, is his unusual ease, showing that he clearly understands each theme, has confidence in himself and in his players. He did not make many dramatic gestures, but those that he occasionally did make were expressive and unusually forceful. Throughout the four selections he was calm, passive, and quick in his movements, but, assuredly, he drew music from his orchestra, as, it may well be said, one of the grandest concerts that ever resounded through that grand hall was heard last evening. Throughout the concert he was reserved and straight like a stalwart leader who guides his men to certain victory.

The program, containing four selections, was varied. Two of them were played Thursday evening when Mr. Koussevitzky for the first time conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

Beginninig with Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," opus 9, the master of the baton showed his audience the fire and gusto he could produce from his players.

Debussy's "Two Nosturnes" came next. "Nuages" and "Fetts," the former noted for its softness of tone, its mellow sweetness, and the latter for its spirit of brilliancy and joyous effervescence. Then the exquisiteness of the music of Debussy, the touching melody of "Nuages" were at their best. It was after this part of the program that Mr. Koussevitzky was so warmly applauded, and it then became a recognized fact that the conductor had indeed made himself truly acceptable to the Brooklyn lovers of good music.

"Le Poeme de l'Extase," Scriabin's marvelous tone poem of rhapsody, came next. Applause after applause greeted the conductor after this selection.

The last number was Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Opus 67." The "Andante con mote" was the most impressive part of this symphony. It was a selection of beauteaus sweetness filled with delightful pianissimos.

This was the first in a series of five philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, and, if the reception by such a representative Brooklyn audience is to be taken as a criterion, it may well be said that the European conductor will continue gaining his laurels here.

NEW YORK
POST
NOV 29 1924

Boston Symphony Concert Today

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play in Carnegie Hall at 2:30 o'clock this afternoon. An error in the advertising columns gave the time as tomorrow afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 29 19

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

SERGE KOUSSEWITSKY, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, made his bow to Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last evening. It was, according to prophecy, a bow quite as successful as that which he made to Manhattan's public on Thursday. For the program, he had selected to repeat the Overture to "Oberon," the Debussy Nocturnes, Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and to substitute Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the Vivaldi Concerto and Honegger's "Pacific 231."

It is a deserved success that Koussewitsky enjoys, for he is undoubtedly the most dynamic personality to preside over an orchestra in New York for many years. His command of the players is immediately evident in the quiet, yet forceful manner in which he directs, in the dignity of his bearing, and in the extraordinary results which he obtains. The opinion somehow got about—it was a matter of newspaper report and musical gossip—that Koussewitsky was in his way a sort of Strawinsky of the baton, a conscienceless modernist, a dramatic Zeus of orchestral destiny, whose only weapons were thunderbolt. In Paris last spring he conducted a concert of Strawinsky's works, "Sacre du Printemps," the Piano Concerto, "Petrouschka," and other pieces, and from this much was deduced. Yet Koussewitsky is also devoted to the classics, a master of them.

He is not a melodramatic conductor—his originality consists only of a sensitive temperament, which compels him to interpret works rather than merely to read them. And his interpretations, while different from any with which we are familiar, do not arrest by reason of eccentricity, for they possess a compelling logic, a new freshness which adds to our enjoyment of music long familiar.

It was last evening as if we were hearing the "Oberon" Overture for the first time. It is hard to recall so delicate a pianissimo as that which Koussewitsky achieved in the opening bars. The tone of the horn was hardly above a whisper, yet it was smooth, round and penetrated the house. The answer in the strings was replete with elfin suggestion, delicate and spirited. Koussewitsky moulds his phrases with nothing short of genius—the performance was detailed, yet a compact whole.

Debussy's two Nocturnes were the climax of the evening. The first, "Nuage," had exactly the right quality of bleakness—it reminded one of certain paintings by Nicholas Roerich with their cold cloud-covered skies. Not only was the balance maintained with perfection in the wind groups, but the timbre of the English horn, of the oboe and the flutes seemed to acquire a magic suggestiveness. The whole was a delicate painting in tones probably very close to what Debussy attempted to suggest in his notes: "a grey agony, tinged with white."

In the phantasmal procession that moves through the distance in "Fetes" Koussewitsky achieved extraordinary effects. The first distant fanfare of trumpets actually did have the suggestion of something unreal and far off. The climax, as the procession draws nearer, was less fine—it was too loud, in great contrast to the fine pianissimo preceding it. The entire Nocturne was perhaps a bit emphatic in its outlines, lacking some of the shimmer, the dreamlike quality which it has had under other conductors.

For his reading of Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase," Koussewitsky has won much applause. Certainly if anything could be done to make this music sound like more than a theosophical Liszt, he has done it. The phrases are moulded in voluptuous waves, the music comes from the orchestra in ever increasing billows of sound—it has even a certain majesty, and the climax is truly terrific. The component parts of Scriabin's poem are merged into a plastic, inevitable whole under Koussewitsky's hands. However, this hardly compensates for the platitudes that it contains. Its ecstasy is cheap, tasteless, and Scriabin as we come to know him better seems orchestrally to have been the composer of one representative work, the "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire."

The Beethoven Symphony was a remarkable piece of work. Koussewitsky sees it as a thing of classic line, full of dramatic portent, at times threatening, at times, as in the Andante, consoling. He gives it to us in large, Beethovian masses, but masses in which the detail is endless and exquisitely done. The Scherzo, with its awesome pianissimo entrance into the Finale, has never had quite the effect that it had last evening. It can do longer be said, after Thursday's Vivaldi and last evening's Beethoven, that Koussewitsky is unsympathetic to classics, for he expends upon them the same care and intelligence that he brings to the modern music he has placed before us.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
RECORD
NOV 29 19[illegible]

George Arliss Back

Serge Koussevietsky, famous Russian conductor, made his first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Michael Mordkin is back at the Winter Garden after an absence of more than a decade.

[illegible] BOOKS RECEIVED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 29 19[illegible]

Serge Koussevitzky Makes Boro Debut at Academy

Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his Brooklyn debut last night at the Academy of Music before a capacity house of representative Brooklynites. Man ymusicians wehre also in the audience to hear what the newcomer had to give in the way of innocations and interpretations.

What Mr. Koussevitsky did was to repeat his success of the previous evening, when he made his debut at Carneige Hall. He played at least three of the same numbers last night. The symphony of the program was, however, Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, by Beethoven, which he rendered, as the word got about, as though it were written yesterday. That is true of all Mr. Koussevitzky's work. He conducts in an entirely individual way. From the moment he walks containedl yand slowly from the wings and acknowledges the applause of his audience with careful dignity to the moment he drops his arms after the last great chord one is conscious that a new personality is before one from whom to expect new things.

The first four numbers on the program could hardly be said to be blood cousins, for they were "The Roman Carnival," overture, by Berlioz; two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," by Debussy, and "Le Poeme de l'Extase," by Scriabin. But in the handling o feach the characteristics of Koussevitzky's readings and his personality could be felt. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a "jumpy" conductor. His movements seem to have taken on some of the easy river swing of the Russian river on which he is said to have gone from town to town giving chance concerts. His tempo is slowed up to that of an unhurried river between wide banks that seeks the sea in a gradual way. And the scope, quietness and underlying power of the music he brings from his musicians is easily a part of this river symbol.

In all, Mr. Koussevitzky has brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a new period of greatness an dto new interest in the public eye. More than that, he has brought an added store of interpretation to the music of the symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 29 1924

Society Honors Leader Of Boston Symphony

Representatives of the dramatic and operatic stages and of society attended a supper last night at the Lido-Venice for Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Richard T. Wilson, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Newbold Morris, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mrs. Daniel de Monocal of Boston and Josef Stransky formed the reception committee.

Among those attending the supper were Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Thieriot, Mrs. Stanley P. Gifford, Charles E. Sampson, Justice and Mrs. Norman S. Dike, Col. and Mrs. William Hayward, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler, Mr. and Mrs. S. Stanwood Menken, Louis Wiley, Mme. Frances Alda, Mr. and Mrs. Willard S. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Rothier, Mr. and Mrs. Giovanni Martinelli, Dr. and Mrs. Frank E. Adair, Mrs. Moses Taylor Campbell and Cecil Barret.

Also Mr. and Mrs. John Peltz, Giulio Setti, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Tibbet, Lawrence Butler, William Matheus Sullivan, Edward Seidle, Carl Schlegel, Miss Queena Mario, Miss Helena Marsh, Mr. and Mrs. Morin S. Hare, Mrs. Oliver Harriman, Col. G. Creighton Webb, Mrs. Madelein Mackay, Edmund Burke, Capt. Francesco M. Guardabassi, Dr. and Mrs. Walter P. Anderson, Mrs. Charles Hopper, Mr. and Mrs. Griswold A. Thompson, Miss Louisa Wilson, James O'Gorman, Henry Corse, Jr., Miss Marie Dressler and Miss Kathleen Hayward.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 30 1924

Symphony's Next Concert

Almost on the heels of its opening concert, the Boston Symphony returns for its second appearance a week from this Tuesday, Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D-major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, and Weber's "Oberon" overture will be the opening selections. Wagner will be represented by three excerpts from his music drama, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the "Funeral Music" of Siegfried from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." A novelty that has aroused much interest in Boston is "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer") by de Falla, said to be music of characteristic Spanish flavor.

With the exception of the Bach concerto, all the music for the concert is in the Providence Public Library. This concerto was given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 24 and 25, and an account of it is in the concert programmes on file in the library.

The Symphony programmes here print an announcement that the music it plays is available at the library. This means, of course, the music that may be secured. "Pacific 231," for instance, is not published for general distribution. The library's custom is to send an order for music lacking from its files as soon as word it received it is to be played here, and instances are rare when copies do not arrive in season.

The Tschaikowski concerto, whose first movement Mr. Besekirsky is to play today, and Dvorak's "Slavonic Dance" are at the library.

Two additions last week are the piano arrangements of the "Hindu Prayer," by Berge, and "Czardas," from "Coppelia," by Delibes, which completes the music in the library in connection with the programme of the concert to be given by the Providence Orchestral Association.

Among its music literature the library has the "Common Sense of Music," by Spaeth, to be reviewed at the next meeting of the Schubert Club on Dec. 8.

In connection with the recital of Rachmaninoff an account of him in "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montagu-Nathan; "Musical Portraits," by Rosenfeld, and a chapter called "Rakhmaninov the Puritan," in "Eighth Notes," by Parker, will be of interest. These, together with the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Jan. 27, 1920, when he was the soloist, have been placed on a table in the Music Library, for the coming week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 29 1924

should be profoundly [illegible]

KOUSSEVITZKY ARRIVES.

The consensus seems to be that Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is as great as he had been declared to be. For this we may be thankful. The leadership of the Boston Orchestra, or any of our great orchestras, is in many ways more important than the Presidency of one of our universities. Too often we have seen great orchestras fall into the hands of some absurd little fellow more fit for matinée acting than interpretation of music. The new conductor was evidently at some pains to correct an impression that he was sensational, and in this he was wise, if he has ever had a leaning in that direction. The American public has acquired a keen eye for the musical grandstander, and theatricality is no longer a virtue. The Boston Orchestra has suffered lamentable vicissitudes since the departure of Muck, although Monteux did heroic service toward rebuilding it. If the new conductor can pick up the reins where Monteux left off and attain to still higher ground he will have done us an inestimable service.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 29 1924

SUPPER TO KOUSSEVITZKY.

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Entertained at Lido-Venice.

Prominent persons in artistic and social life attended the supper last night at the Lido-Venice in honor of Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which began its thirty-ninth season in this city on Thanksgiving night at Carnegie Hall. Mrs. Richard T. Wilson, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Newbold Morris, Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mrs. Daniel de Menocal of Boston and Josef Stransky were members of the Reception Committee.

Among those present were Mme. Frances Alda, Miss Queena Mario, Miss Marie Dressler, Mr. and Mrs. Giovanni Martinelli, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Rothier, Giulio Setti, Edward Seidle, Carl Schlegel, Miss Janet Adamson and Edmund Burke. Also Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Thieriot, Mrs. Stanley Gifford, Mr. and Mrs. Willard S. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Griswold A. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. John Peltz, Mrs. Oliver Harriman and Mr. and Mrs. Morin S. Ha[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 30 1924

At Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon, Dec. 5, and Saturday evening, Dec 6, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will dedicate the seventh concert of the season to the memory of Gabriel Fauré, the great French composer, who departed this life Nov. 4 at the age of 79. He was born at Pamiers in 1845.

The following is the program:

Locatelli .....Funeral Symphony
Faure ...Elegy for Violoncello and Orchestra
(Violoncello solo—Jean Bedetti.)
Faure .....Overture to "Penelope"
Ravel ....."Alborada del Gracioso"
(First time at these concerts.)
Scriabin .....Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," Op. 43.
Lento: Luttes—Allegro; Voluptes—Lento: Jeu Divin—Allegro.

The programme of this concert is posted on the bulletin board in this department.

* * *

The books for use in Prof. Wier's extension course at Brown University, called "The Violin Family," have been placed on reserve on a table in the music library. They are "Die Geigen und Lautenmacher von Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart," by Lutgendorff; "The Violin, Its Construction," by Broadhouse; "British Violin Makers," by Morris; "Hawley Collection of Violins," "The Violin, Its Famous Makers and Their Imitators," by Hart; "Old Violins," by Haweis; "Violin Making, As It Was and Is," by Herron Allen, and "Antonio Stradivari, His Life and Work," by Hill.

* * *

Nov. 30

Symphony's Next Concert

Almost on the heels of its opening concert, the Boston Symphony returns for its second appearance a week from this Tuesday, Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto for Orchestra in D-major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, and Weber's "Oberon" overture will be the opening selections. Wagner will be represented by three excerpts from his music drama, the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the "Funeral Music" of Siegfried from the last act of "The Dusk of the Gods," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." A novelty that has aroused much interest in Boston is "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer") by de Falla, said to be music of characteristic Spanish flavor.

With the exception of the Bach concerto, all the music for the concert is in the Providence Public Library. This concerto was given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 24 and 25, and an account of it is in the concert programmes on file in the library.

The Symphony programmes here print an announcement that the music it plays is available at the library. This means, of course, the music that may be secured. "Pacific 231," for instance, is not published for general distribution. The library's custom is to send an order for music lacking from its files as soon as word it received it is to be played here, and instances are rare when copies do not arrive in season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 30 1924

Jean Bedetti

Boston Symphony 'cellist, is soloist with University Glee Club next Friday night at Memorial Hall.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNI[O]
NOV 29 192[4]

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its annual five Brooklyn concerts, under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, last night, before a capacity audience. The programme was:

Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The event, which marked Mr. Koussevitzky's first Brooklyn appearance, will be reviewed at length in the music columns of to-morrow's Standard Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNIO[N]
NOV 30 192[4]

Koussevitzky Conducts

The pomp of a gala night was manifested Friday evening, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, in honor of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, successor to Pierre Monteux as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making his Brooklyn debut under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Koussevitzky's continental fame, Petrograd, Paris and London, spiced with many stories of heated disputations of which he was the centre, had cast their spell upon the interest awaiting his advent to American shores, and, lastly, the acclaim of Boston and Thanksgiving night's New York triumph in Carnegie Hall had whetted the anticipation of his first appearance in Brooklyn. In consequence, the regular habitues of the Academy, reinforced by most of Brooklyn's musically elect, filled it to the point of overflow. And what impression has he left?

There can be no doubt that it was a strong one, nor gainsaid the superfineness of his work, his imposing personality and something of an originality not dreamed of heretofore in other conductors' philosophies and readings. The expectation which was pitched for "surprises" was not disappointed, though nothing whatsoever of a sensational turn transpired.

The programme was Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Scriabine's "Le Poeme de l'Extase" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Berlioz opening held the audience's attention closely, offering palatable food for contemplation and appetizing zest for the following Debussy nocturnes, wherein lay much delight along their way's length. Mr. Koussevitzky professes nonpartiality for the schools; his catholicity embracing all with equal ardor, countries and periods irrespective.

In the overlong Scriabine Poeme, while there are a number of exalted pages and moments of ecstasy, there are also moments of seemingly aimless wanderings, as if inspiration were at a stop. Some substantial cuts could be made without injustice to this Scriabine score, which at its best is akin to glorified salon music. The climax is an unusual piece of virtuosity for both orchestra and conductor, with the organ lending the swell of its vibrations to the thrill intensive ecstasy.

No doubt could exist of the original force brought to bear on Beethoven's symphony, in the complete and permanent contour in which its presentation was conceived. It was a version cast in perfect art form, without attempting to uncover startlingly new effects. And yet there were evidences, here and there, of Debussy-like ilk—a frequent reversion to what is Mr. Koussevitzky's habitual love of cloudy pianissimi, foreign soil, indeed, it might seem to some supercritics, for the sturdy German Beethoven, whose softest passages or sections were never meant for such smotherings. But it was a beautifully proportioned interpretation, and one a privilege to have heard, a satisfactory reading of this great myriad-minded work, whose composer's genius, so expansive and generous, is destined for many conceptions along the line in Time's corridor. In retrospect such a version as Koussevitzky's stands out as cyclopean, revealing a massively unmatched Beethoven, towering grimly and terrifically beautiful.

As conductor Mr. Koussevitzky is engrossing; physically the eye watches his every movement, none of which go to waste, each of which is eloquent of intent and illuminative to his co-operators as to the will of his aesthetic imagination. A study in conservation of outward gesture, contained as a pent-up volcano with its eruptive powers at command. His back is grace personified. His control is colossal in its inner strength. His is an overpowering, superior, individualized presence, and an ego that completely envelops and domi[illegible]ates all.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOS ANGELES
CAL.
HERALD
NOV 29 1924

Serge Koussevietsky, a Russian conductor of distinction, made his first New York appearance this week with the Boston symphony, and Mikhail Mordkin, the dancer, who first came to our shores with Pavlowa in the far-off days before the war, is back at the Winter Garden after a ten years' absence.

210 THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 30 1924

A NEW MUSICAL WAR OPENS BRILLIANTLY

Koussevitsky and Stokowski Strive to Win the Favor of New York With Their Batons

A NEW musical rivalry, one of the kind that always fascinates the public, has begun in New York City, the best of battlegrounds for such conflicts. It opposes two brilliant and extraordinarily picturesque music generals, Serge Koussevitsky, who made his bow to New Yorkers last week as conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The intense interest in the initial appearance hereabouts of Koussevitsky is evident in that infallible index of popular sentiment, the box office. One series of the Boston Symphony has been completely subscribed for weeks. The other series is virtually disposed of.

All this marks an astonishing change in the fortunes of the Boston Symphony since Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe under the Espionage act in 1917. Since that day patronage of the New York concerts of the Boston orchestra, though it was rapidly improving in the last season, has languished. There were many causes for the decline and they operated in spite of the admirable work done in bringing the organization back to pre-war excellence by Pierre Monteux, whose star was just becoming ascendant when he was replaced in Boston by Koussevitsky. The New York public, say the supporters of Monteux, was only learning to appreciate his greatness at the time he left America.

The great fact of the moment, however, is that Koussevitsky has restored, in the eyes of the local public, the old fascination that the concerts of the Boston Symphony once had, and that, by the same token, he is making a fresh and threatening attack on the position of undisputed orchestral supremacy that Stokowski has held in this city in late years.

Stokowski's remarkable rise to his present position is still living history. He started his career as conductor in Cincinnati. He soon left to become head of the Philadelphia orchestra. He was, and is, a remarkable musician, but remarkable musicians, as such, have not always been successful. Stokowski subjugated the public of his city. He was handsome and slim. He had a tailor. These things are mentioned in the order of their importance in a conductor's career.

Gifted and Ambitious

The things of secondary importance also followed. Stokowski proved himself, with stern critics as well as with adoring denizens of the tea-table, to be one of the most gifted leaders of the day. His personality was felt from the platform. He had the flair for effect that the nervous American public loves. A very ambitious man and one by no means a dullard in practical affairs, he took advantage in masterly fashion of the havoc that the war and unionism had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he won over the finest elements of its New York public. Since the departure of Karl Muck, Stokowski has assumed more and more a leading position among American conductors.

Mengelberg has come and has been prodigiously acclaimed. He has not unseated Stokowski. This year the Philharmonic Society of New York offers five conductors to its patrons, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Mengelberg, Furtwangler and, as the most sensational offering of all, the composer-conductor, Igor Stravinsky. The New York Symphony, in addition to Walter Damrosch, offers as guests Bruno Walter, who made an excellent impression last season, and Vladimir Golschman, whose success when he conducted a single concert of Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last Winter, was exceptional.

These things have not affected in the slightest degree the allegiance of Stokowski's supporters. The concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra were over-subscribed months before the opening concerts of this Fall and there is said to be a waiting list that assures over-subscription for three years to come. But now, it is whispered, a change is coming. It is believed to be imminent in the person of Koussevitsky and the orchestra which his name, by some odd magic, has already restored to New York's favor.

Leopold Stokowski.

For Koussevitsky, to pursue again the order of the qualifications required for a successful conductor, has also a figure, a trifle taller, a little broader and, notwithstanding his 50 years, a very little fuller than that of Stokowski. He has a tailor, too, and wears his clothes as a man of the world who can take his place in any society. Koussevitsky, with remarkable interpretive abilities, is also a master of virtuoso effects, not merely by attainment and cultivation, but by inborn temperament.

Your virtuoso is not necessarily a superficial musician or charlatan, as some interpret the word today. As the American composer MacDowell once put it, he has in him something of the tight-rope dancer. The crowd awakens from him a certain response which cannot be aroused in any other way. The virtuoso instinctively feels his audience and reacts to it. Koussevitsky and Stokowski have equally these qualities. Koussevitsky, particularly in modern works, can whip an orchestra and an audience to the top pitch of excitement, and this with the background of a rich, impulsive and genuinely musical nature.

Stokowski's Methods at Rehearsal

But there are many differences of character and of musical style. The personality of Stokowski is a little sharper of outline and perhaps harder of substance than that of his colleague. He is more of the martinet, it is said, with his men; they nevertheless admire him. In rehearsal Stokowski goes relentlessly and impersonally for what he wants. He usually sits on a high stool, with a carafe of water by his side, and works persistently, unromantically, with the most impersonal ardor for his artistic ends. He is oblivious to anything but the fact that there is a human machine before him that can, must, and will carry out his designs.

This does not mean that he lacks emotional quality, or that, in performance, he fails to pour out nervous force and expend physical energy in a manner that might dumfound an iron-jawed business man or an athlete if they could go through a similar experience. Quite the contrary. It is the question of preparedness that is here discussed. Stokowski looks far ahead in his music and other affairs, and woe be to the person who gets between him and his objectives.

He appears on the platform with an effect that is native to him, yet also, without doubt, well calculated for its impression on the audience. That is, he emerges quite suddenly from the wings, walks quickly to the conductor's stand, where the orchestra is completely prepared for him, raises his baton and begins almost before his audience has caught its breath. In New York he conducts everything from memory. In Philadelphia he plays certain works from score. Interpreting music, his slender and erect figure, the decision of his gestures and the generally electrical quality of the man are familiar. They never fail to evoke results.

And Stokowski grows. He has not stood still as a musician for a single season. Those who watch matters musical have commented publicly and privately on this. No one who takes the palm from Stokowski is going to do so easily.

Koussevitsky's methods are, in a certain large way, a little less precise and intensive. He is a man of boiling enthusiasms, of much sensibility and of generous and buoyant disposition. He has always done things in a big way. It is known that in early days he was poor, as most musicians are; that he had an extraordinary talent; that it was hard for him to secure entrance to his conservatory, because it was full and there were rules against the number of applicants who could be admitted. He gained admission by promising to study the double bass, an instrument that happened to be much needed at that time in the conservatory orchestra.

Serge Koussevitsky.

An Invisible Orchestra

He played the double bass as no man born in Russia—or perhaps anywhere else—had made it sound before. Marrying for the second time, he acquired generous means. Another would have relaxed under these improved material conditions. Koussevitsky pressed forward the more eagerly. The story is told that when he decided to pursue the conductor's career he first modified his amateurishness by rehearsing with an invisible orchestra. He had groups of chairs and music desks placed before him in positions that the players would occupy in actual performance; he raised his baton, gave all the cues to the imaginary players and went through all the motions of a public interpretation.

After rehearsing with real orchestras, he summoned the best manager in Berlin and said, "I wish you to advertise my concert. Advertise it thoroughly. Advertise, that everyone may know about it."

The manager, a friend, replied: "Mr. Koussevitsky, I shall advertise as much as you like, but I ought to tell you that you are wasting money. You are not known as a conductor. I doubt if many people will even read your advertisements."

"That needn't trouble you," was Koussevitsky's answer. "Do your part and leave me to do mine. I promise you this: if no one else reads my advertisements I will read them. I will go out every morning at 8 o'clock and read every one of them. Put up the advertisements."

Koussevitsky, the conductor, is acutely the master of himself when he leads the orchestra. His blood seems to run hot and cold at once. He will stir the men to a frenzy of enthusiasm and keep them at a white heat for hours. All the time he is watching the smallest details and he will stop the whole excited band at any second, for any number of times, to analyze in the most frigid and deliberate manner a technical detail or a shading that is not precisely what he wishes. He will at times exhort his men and give them some little illustrations of what he wants.

He treats them as companions and colleagues, but not too much as colleagues, retaining control, causing not only respect but even trepidation from those who do not exactly obey him. Before his first American concert, after a grueling rehearsal, he turned to the orchestra with a disarming smile, saying "Now, we understand one another. Tomorrow you will do your best and I will do my best, and all will."

It is said that the Boston Orchestra has never tried more wholeheartedly than it has tried with Koussevitsky to carry out the wishes of a leader the men like as much as they esteem. He did not flatter the men when he first met them. He did not tell them, as another previous conductor had, that they composed the greatest orchestra in the world. He had quite other comment. "You can do anything you wish," he said, "but do it more freely. Don't be afraid. The principal thing that I need from you is response and elasticity." He will not tolerate laxness in any respect and shows it in ways great and small. One of them concerns the tuning of instruments in public. It has hitherto been the habit for the Boston Symphony players to lounge on the stage ten or more minutes before the concert and tune and scrape until the time that the conductor appears. Yet Symphony Hall has always had a tuning room. Now the orchestra members use it and enter the concert hall quietly and in readiness for the conductor.

As Seen by His Audience

On the platform Koussevitsky is an interesting figure. He has an air of complete confidence, ease and quiet command. There is a distinction in his bearing that is "intriguing," as the young ladies say. His graying hair, his very mobile features, the sparkling eye and the sensitive hands carry out the effect. He often conducts without score and usually with but the scantest attention to the score when it is before him. His gestures are conspicuously expressive but not superfluous. An effect is made on orchestra and on audience, too, but is is not an unnecessary or a manufactured effect. It is the felicitous visualization of what Koussevitsky wants from his men and it is valuable to the conductor, to whose interest it is to present a picture as well as a score to the audience.

Koussevitsky, and Stokowski, too, have seen much of life and fought many battles, each in his own way. Even if they were not musicians they would be figures in the world. They alone would be sufficient to give new impetus and excitement to New York's musical season.

THE DETROIT NEWS, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1924.

FIVE WISE MEN OF THE EAST

...Romantic like Stokowsky, ...refrigerated like Stransky, or ...nsuous like Koussevitzky.

He is his own man, is Willem Van Hoogstraten, while Serge Koussevitzky, for example, is his tailor's man. But before taking train for Boston I wish to mention the pleasing cosmopolitanism of Mr. van Hoogstraten's orchestra. Beyond such characteristic names as Van Vliet and Van Praag, there is a delicious Van Koppenhagen (in the cellos); there is a Berlin and Verona; a Wagner, an Edison, and a Smith.

THE BEST DRESSED.

The preceding comment on the new Boston conductor is not wholly the fruits of my own malicious heart. A dear old lady in Boston echoed audibly what I had dared only to think: Serge Koussevitzky is the best tailored man who ever shook a stick at an orchestra. He is not merely well-dressed, he is superbly and superlatively dressed in a way no street-car advertisement ever dreamed of. And no matter what his gestures or how high his musical passions, he loses not a line of beauty nor a touch of grace throughout a long and exacting program.

Mr. Koussevitzky strides on the platform and his very gait envelops his admirably conventional appearance with an aura of importance. As he confronts his audience he is the most conventional of men, refined, tailor-wise, to the acme of inconspicuous niceness. He parts his hair on the left, as many a good man does; his collar is rather low than high, but not too low; his tie is normal; he retains his cuffs throughout the performance; there is nothing outwardly contributing to an extravagant personality except his strong and not unhandsome features, his svelte figure and his superlative toilet.

He conducts from his heels, standing bolt upright; perhaps to make the most of his medium height. On his heels he pivots squarely to left, to right, to center; from his heel he brings the sole of his foot sharply down to emphasize tempo or incite crisis. His conducting is, as you may observe, positive; the most positive of any conductor before the American public. But his positiveness seems akin to that of the sciolist; he has no time to probe depths, but can give a dazzling pregnancy to superficialities. I can make this clear by saying that I do not want to be there when he conducts a Beethoven symphony, while I shall be unwilling, for a long time to come, to hear any other conduct the "Bacchanale."

HE'S AN ACTOR.

But the voluptuous excitement of the latter was so much on the surface as to be entirely and immodestly visible; Richard Wagner did not turn in his grave those two days in Boston, he went on his knees and gave praise.

Koussevitzky is not only a conductor, he is an actor; and he does all but declaim when his interest is solidly engaged. He crouches and conducts from his hips or from around his knees, and then shoots up and onto his heels for a smart wheel this way or that, and all in the snappiest manner. Undoubtedly he is of the type become popular in this country, and elsewhere; wherever he goes, I imagine the result will be the same, reams of publicity and fervent acclaim, even though I found among his Boston public those who are withholding judgment. He is, for the moment, music's "Wizard of Oz"; he is a man who can make music throb and burn and amaze, but not ennoble. Also he is an adventurer, as witness the long initial proclamation wherein he recited the new works he had first produced at concerts abroad. Music needs a personable and convincing adventurer of authority; Providence supplies Koussevitzky; Boston sponsors him; and if accepted there, that will be sufficient consecration.

ising, and so forth—there was a grain or two of truth and a grain or two of the whispering belittlement which is launched against every prominent conductor. But Stokowski, the golden idol of the podium, was also a musician, and, as events showed, a wise man.

Chiefly he has been wise enough to live down the blight of popularity, modifying those things which were obviously superficial in their bid for esteem, and developing his musicianship by hard and sincere work. The art of program-making I believe to be his weakest point as the art of music-making is his highest. But he who enters a discussion on program-making sets foot in a labyrinth of despair and desolation. The art of music-making, on the contrary, is a fairly well-marked road, its landscapes visible, its horizons suggestive, its borders rich with sustaining elements.

DOWN FROM OLYMPUS.

Stokowski is great, then, both for the things he has abandoned and for the things he has achieved. I wonder if there is any additional secret to his amazing results other than prodigious energy and psychological insight?

He is much more a part of his orchestra than formerly. It is as if he had marched heroically down from the Olympus of the Koussevitzkies—an Olympus shared these days by movie stars, base ball heroes and football coaches—toward the less conspicuous solid rock where stands Walter Damrosch and, halting midway, has found the happy eminence between advertisement and self-effacement. He is, it is true, still the deus ex machina, for his appearance alone condemns him to a demi-godship on any platform; but the human side of him has found its place and has brought to his orchestral medium a sympathetic imagination which some years ago neither did nor could exist.

For those who care about such things, the Philadelphia Orchestra is seated differently from any of the others I have seen. The orchestra forms a keystone, with the broad end at the front, slightly curved in front of the podium. All the musicians face the audience or at the least are three-quarter face to the front, with a somewhat piled-up effect. The arrangement is immediately noticeable, although I can not say what if any advantage it possesses; nor can I think of any reason against it.

SORRY FOR STRANSKY.

There remains Josef Stransky. And what can I say about Mr. Stransky? Very little. From my celestial perch in Carnegie Hall Mr. Stransky seemed a remote, lonely and diminished figure, going through cold and formal motions. Perhaps this was optical illusion and, seen from the more intimate parquet his motions enlarged themselves to an ecstacy of passion; I can't say. But I feel sorry for Mr. Stransky, without knowing exactly why. Even at such a vasty depth from me he was, obviously, a goodly man, well-fashioned and handsome as ever. Yet the little figure seemed, at that distance, to march Beethoven's "Eroica" dully and with disenchantment, and inspiration seemed buried in a tomb of remembrance. I make no doubt Stransky remains a great conductor. It is a relative term. How relative was tragically symbolized by the trick of vision which overcast him with the shadow of his own orchestra.

Five great men. Vowed to eschew superlatives, we may confess to discovering no rich and brilliant personality; no quintessence of leadership. Yet—five great men, ranging from the margin of Parnassus to the middle lands of comparative genius which stretch their lengthy miles toward the commonplace where you, dear reader, and I, sit, wonder, and admire.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK AMERICAN
NOV 30 1924

211

Russian Leader Thrills Hearers for Second Time

Koussevitzky Carries Boston Orchestra to Triumph at Its Matinee.

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

CARNEGIE HALL held an audience yesterday afternoon which had been made expectant by the good reports that followed the local debut here on Thursday evening of Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The matinee listeners encountered a somewhat unusual programme, consisting of Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmilla" overture, the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" (scherzo from "Tsar Sultan"); Prokokieff's "Scythian Suite," and Brahms's Fourth symphony.

Koussevitzky again demonstrated his fine skill with the baton and artistic manner of communicating the musical contents of the scores he and his players interpreted.

He is keen for details, but in their minute exposition loses nothing of the larger lines or meanings.

He leans to sharp contrasts and highly colored dramatizations. The lyrical, however, also is within his grasp. He makes his men give of their best.

You will find no dull moments in a Koussevitzky reading. He is an interesting and arresting leader.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff piece, a dainty bit of orchestral tomfoolery, had to be repeated. Extreme tonal delicacy marked the Moussorgsky performance. In Brahms, the poetry rather than the ruggedness, found the most emphasis. The Prokokieff suite has many clever and picturesque moments, and even some important ones. It is descriptive music, but not terrifyingly ultra-modern. It even has melody.

The audience showered applause upon Koussevitzky, and he made his orchestra rise repeatedly in order to share in the tributes.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
NOV 29 1924

Kousse...

By WINTHROP P. TRYON

New York, Nov. 27

PEOPLE who attended the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall, this evening, showed signs of disappointment. Not that they had anything to complain of in the new man holding the baton, or any fault to find with the men, familiar names in good part, performing on t... appla... artists warmly at the close of every number on the program. But they gave unmistakable signs of having lost a world of fine illusionment with regard to modern music. Debussy, Scriabin, and Honegger they perceived to be, after all, in no essential respect different from Vivaldi and Weber. This loud, bustling, and pretentious today, they found, is the very same matter as calm, classic, reticent and uninvidious yesterday.

Or, to think of the case in terms of objective criticism, the Boston Symphony conductor took all the modernist nonsense out of Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes," Scriabin's poem, "Ecstasy," and Honegger's piece, "Pacific 231," and disclosed their true content. He presented them precisely as he presented Vivaldi's concerto in D minor and Weber's overture to "Oberon," with obvious aim to bring out every detail of melodic line and orchestral color, every contrast of mood and every emphasis that the composer has put into his score. So doing, he gave the impression of setting before the public not, forsooth, examples of old-time music and recent music, but meditations and communications in tones that speak independently of place and period.

Koussevitzky is another Nikisch, with a stout red fist, instead of a small white hand. And when he undoubles and opens out that left fist of his, he shows such spread of fingers as never before signaled diminuendo to violins and such crook of index as never before summoned sigh from flute. That is saying nothing of his right hand and its vast range of movements, from the merest shiver to the complete triangular swing of down, out and up.

Koussevitzky is another Toscanini, in that he knows his scores by heart, backward and forward. And yet, he shows the good judgment to keep the book before him on the desk and to turn the pages as studiously as in rehearsal. He is a conservative musician, in that he tends to moderate tempi. Which means that he is a conscientious one, making every element in the composer's structure clear to the listener.

Francis Macmillen, the violinist, ...of Nov. ...piano. ...which she ... voice and th... were the "Fa... "Apaisement ... "Dansons l... Wagnerian ... flowery mes... seemed a lit... evident deli... she greatly ... therewithal.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
NOV 30 1924

MORE ABOUT KOUSSEVITZKY AS A DOUBLE BASS PLAYER

Several times since it was announced that the Russian, Koussevitzky, was to conduct the Boston orchestra reference has been made in these columns that he was a double bass soloist before he took up the baton. The more one hears along this line the more anxious one becomes to hear the conductor as a soloist on his favorite instrument. Bass viol soloists are rare specimens in the musical world and a lot of people think there wouldn't be much to a program of such solos. But, if all they say of Koussevitzky is true, he must be a wizard. A reminder is brought in a letter from Valdimir Dubinsky, a 'cellist and teacher, of New York, who knew Koussevitzky in his student days, in which among other things he says that when Koussevitzky plays a double bass in solo it becomes another instrument entirely and one that gives music of extreme beauty. Other conductors play concerts as soloists, perhaps Koussevitzky will before he has been in America many years.

THE DETROIT NEWS, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1924.

FIVE WISE MEN OF THE EAST

ising, and so forth—there was a grain or two of truth and a grain or two of the whispering belittlement which is launched against every prominent conductor. But Stokowski, the golden idol of the podium, was also a musician, and, as events showed, a wise man.

Chiefly he has been wise enough to live down the blight of popularity, modifying those things which were obviously superficial in their bid for esteem, and developing his musicianship by hard and sincere work. The art of program-making I believe to be his weakest point as the art of music-making is his highest. But he who enters a discussion on program-making orchestra than formerly. It is as if he had marched heroically down from the Olympus of the Koussevitzkies—an Olympus shared these days by movie stars, base ball heroes and football coaches—toward the less conspicuous solid rock where stands Walter Damrosch and, halting midway, has found the happy eminence between advertisement and self-effacement. He is, it is true, still the deus ex machina, for his appearance alone condemns him to a demi-godship on any platform; but the human side of him has found its place and has brought to his orchestral me-

Exquisite 3-Pc. Velour $1

GIFTS that reflect the spirit of love will find no finer example than in a beautiful outfit for the home! You can well picture the happiness a new bit of furniture would bring to all—and here's a complete 3-piece overstuffed velour suite—as comfortable as you'd want it —to be had for only .....

Terms—$8.95 Cash.

Charming New Rugs for

9x12-Ft. Brusse

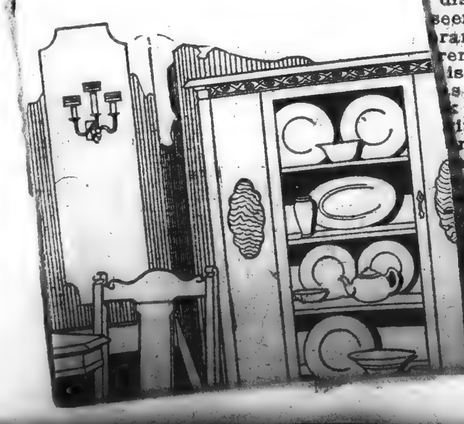
THEN—don't forget rugs! A new, lovely rug for Christmas would make a useful, charming gift and you are enabled to purchase economically at this large store. Beautiful, first-quality Brussels are featured at .....

9x12 Ft. Axminsters .....

9x12 Ft. Velvets .....

9x12 Ft. Wilton .....

Dignified



ves to an ecstacy of passion; say. But I feel sorry for nsky, without knowing ex- y. Even at such a vasty om me he was, obviously, man, well-fashioned and as ever. Yet the little emed, at that distance, to ethoven's "Eroica" dully disenchantment, and in- seemed buried in a tomb rance. I make no doubt remains a great con- is a relative term. How s tragically symbolized of vision which over- ith the shadow of his ra.

t men. Vowed to latives, we may con- overing no rich and sonality; no quintes- rship. Yet—five great from the margin of the middle lands of enius which stretch iles toward the com- e you, dear reader, der, and admire.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
NOV 30 1924

211

Russian Leader Thrills Hearers for Second Time

Koussevitzky Carries Boston Orchestra to Triumph at Its Matinee.

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

CARNEGIE HALL held an audience yesterday afternoon which had been made expectant by the good reports that followed the local debut here on Thursday evening of Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The matinee listeners encountered a somewhat unusual programme, consisting of Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmilla" overture, the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" (scherzo from "Tsar Sultan"); Prokokieff's "Scythian Suite," and Brahms's Fourth symphony.

Koussevitzky again demonstrated his fine skill with the baton and artistic manner of communicating the musical contents of the scores he and his players interpreted.

He is keen for details, but in their minute exposition loses nothing of the larger lines or meanings.

He leans to sharp contrasts and highly colored dramatizations. The lyrical, however, also is within his grasp. He makes his men give of their best.

You will find no dull moments in a Koussevitzky reading. He is an interesting and arresting leader.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff piece, a dainty bit of orchestral tomfoolery, had to be Until Ch

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
NOV 29 1924

Koussevitzky in New York

By WINTHROP P. TRYON

New York, Nov. 27

PEOPLE who attended the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall, this evening, showed signs of disappointment. Not that they had anything to complain of in the new man holding the baton, or any fault to find with the men, familiar names in good part, performing on the instruments. Indeed, they applauded Mr. Koussevitzky and his artists warmly at the close of every number on the program. But they gave unmistakable signs of having lost a world of fine illusionment with regard to modern music. Debussy, Scriabin, and Honegger they perceived to be, after all, in no essential respect different from Vivaldi and Weber. This loud, bustling, and pretentious today, they found, is the very same matter as calm, classic, reticent and uninvidious yesterday.

Or, to think of the case in terms of objective criticism, the Boston Symphony conductor took all the modernist nonsense out of Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes," Scriabin's poem, "Ecstasy," and Honegger's piece, "Pacific 231," and disclosed their true content. He presented them precisely as he presented Vivaldi's concerto in D. minor and Weber's overture to "Oberon," with obvious aim to bring out every detail of melodic line and orchestral color, every contrast of mood and every emphasis that the composer has put into his score. So doing, he gave the impression of setting before the public not, forsooth, examples of old-time music and recent music, but meditations and communications in tones that speak independently of place and period.

Koussevitzky is another Nikisch, with a stout red fist, instead of a small white hand. And when he undoubles and opens out that left fist of his, he shows such spread of fingers as never before signaled diminuendo to violins and such crook of index as never before summoned sigh from flute. That is saying nothing of his right hand and its vast range of movements, from the merest shiver to the complete triangular swing of down, out and up.

Koussevitzky is another Toscanini, in that he knows his scores by heart, backward and forward. And yet, he shows the good judgment to keep the book before him on the desk and to turn the pages as studiously as in rehearsal. He is a conservative musician, in that he tends to moderate tempi. Which means that he is a conscientious one, making every element in the composer's structure clear to the listener.

Francis Macmillan, the violinist, ning of Nov.

the piano.
which she voice and th were the "Fa
"Apaisement
"Dansons la
Wagnerian flowery mes seemed a lit evident deli she greatly therewithal.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
NOV 30 1924

It is officially announced by Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the board of directors of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra that Toscanini has consented to conduct a series of concerts beginning in January, 1926. Mengelberg has been reengaged as conductor for portions of three more seasons. Toscanini has refused many offers from American musical organizations, including if rumor speaks truth the conductorship of the Boston Symphony. One wonders whether the announcement from the Philharmonic Orchestra was timed consciously to be published on the day before Koussevitzky's New York debut.

This department of the Sunday Globe goes to press too early for it to be possible to include this week details about Koussevitzky's New York appearances. Comment on them is therefore reserved until the returns are all in.

The Tchaikovsky program for the Pension Fund concert Dec 14 as now set by Koussevitzky includes the fantasy "Francesca da Rimini," the serenade for string orchestra, and the E minor Fifth Symphony.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
NOV 30 1924

E ABOUT KOUSSEVITZKY
AS A DOUBLE BASS PLAYER

Several times since it was announced that the Russian, Koussevitzky, was to conduct the Boston orchestra reference has been made in these columns that he was a double bass soloist before he took up the baton. The more one hears along this line the more anxious one becomes to hear the conductor as a soloist on his favorite instrument. Bass viol soloists are rare specimens in the musical world and a lot of people think there wouldn't be much to a program of such solos. But, if all they say of Koussevitzky is true, he must be a wizard. A reminder is brought in a letter from Valdimir Dubinsky, a 'cellist and teacher, of New York, who knew Koussevitzky in his student days, in which among other things he says that when Koussevitzky plays a double bass in solo it becomes another instrument entirely and one that gives music of extreme beauty. Other conductors play concerts as soloists, perhaps Koussevitzky will before he has been in America many years.

212

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 30 1924

Boston Symphony to Honor Great Composer Who Died in Dire Need

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concerts of this week Mr. Koussevitzky will pay his meed of homage to Gabriel Faure, French composer of long and wide renown who died recently in Paris with a bare six months of his 80th year before him.

Since Faure contributed neither abundantly nor with especial significance to the symphonic repertory Mr. Koussevitzky's commemorative programme is, however, not wholly or even largely made from the composer's own music: on it stands only the Prelude to Faure's austere music-drama "Penelope" and, appropriately, the Elegy for Violoncello and Orchestra. As fitting preface to the whole, then, has been set the "Funeral Symphony" of Locatelli; and since Faure was teacher as well as composer, place is found for the "Alborada del Gracioso" of Maurice Ravel, most distinguished of his many pupils; while Scriabins' "Divine Poem," which brings the end, was chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky as eloquent expression in music of the struggles and aspirations of the creative spirit.

Faure Appraised

In all likelihood "Penelope," Faure's most ambitious if not his most successful achievement, will never find its way to an American stage. Even by the composer's most ardent admirers it is admitted that this opera is wanting, not only in action, but also in essential dramatic feeling in the music itself. Lyric beauty and grave ecstasy it does possess; but the lack of more superficial appeal must ever bar its way to popular favor.

For most music-lovers Faure is primarily the composer of a host of songs remarkable for their restrained yet expressive lyricism, for the close union in them of words and music, for their fineness of texture, and for their exquisite and subtle harmonic foundation. And although he had not the depth and the fervor of Duparc nor the rare imaginativeness and the conquering individualty of Debussy, Faure is by many esteemed the greatest song-writer among French composers.

As composer for the piano, on the other hand, Faure receives scarcely the attention that is his due. A few among his keyboard pieces are undoubtedly slight, and some are but the echoes of Chopin, yet there remains a considerable quantity of music beautiful and deeply personal that should be often heard in the concert hall.

Among modern makers of chamber-music Faure holds an enviable place. His first violin Sonata, undeservedly neglected of late, is one of the most ingratiating pieces of its kind; his first piano Quintet, written at the instigation of the late Gustav Schirmer of New York and published by the Schirmer house, is a work of beauty, originality and importance; his Piano Quartet in G Minor wholly deserves its wide popularity.

It is sad then to relate that, although his country bestowed upon him the Cross of the Legion of Honor and elected him to membership in the Academy, and although his colleagues and disciples deeply reverenced him, Faure's final years were saddened by poverty. From the sale of his compositions he received no substantial return; and his proud nature shunned financial assistance.

This is hardly the time to point out in detail Faure's limitations as composer; the occasional faults of construction in his larger works, his lack of the highest originality, or the absence in his music of passion and vigor—the latter being qualities less esteemed by French musicians than by those of other countries. Better as concluding estimate this paragraph by Emile Vuillermoz, quoted in Edward Burlingame Hill's recent volume "Modern French Music," the latest as well as the most complete and most discriminating study of this engrossing subject, by the way, that has appeared in our language.

"Faure," writes M. Vuillermoz, "was not a simple precursor, a pioneer whose path was enlarged by better equipped explorers. He was a musician who, a quarter of a century in advance of the other composers, spoke freely a prophetic language with an ease, a virtuosity and an elegance which have never been surpassed. He possesses so strong a personality, in spite of his discretion, that he could escape all the influences from which his contemporaries did not always succeed in freeing themselves. In the midst of the Wagnerian epidemic, when Saint-Saens, Franck, Massenet, d'Indy, Chabrier and Duparc did not actually succumb, but were all affected by the contagion, he remained refractory toward the virulent romantic microbe and preserved all his intellectual independence and all his racial sanity. During the epoch when the pupils of Cesar Franck, notwithstanding their demonstrative nationalism, were ingenuously Teutonizing our art, Gabriel Faure, without professions of faith, without dogmas and without a catechism of industry, was the veritable guardian of our national traditions."

And for a final word, this from Jean Aubry's "French Music of Today": "His works are one of the clearest and most precious of the mirrors in which may be seen reflected the varied and touching features of French music."

Modern French Music, by Edward Burlingame Hill. Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston and New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
NOV 30 1924

Boston Showing in New York

SERGI KOUSSEVITZKY, Boston's new Symphony Orchestra conductor, was the guest of honor at a supper given at the Lido-Venice in New York last Friday night. Mesdames Richard T. Wilson, James Lowell Putnam, and Reinhold Morris and Mme. Semmelich were of the committee arranging for what proved to be one of the most successful and enjoyable occasions of the week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
DEC 1 1924

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

TWO RUSSIANS.

The Boston Symphony's first matinee concert on Saturday afternoon offered a second interesting program and threw increased light on the artistic personality of Serge Koussevitzky, its new conductor. The first half of his list was all Russian, comprising the overture to "Ruslan and Liudmila," the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanchtchina," "The Flight of the Bee," from Rimsky's "Tsar Sultan," and a new "Scythian Suite" by Serge Prokofieff. The last named, in form and intent not unlike Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu" suite, received a marvelously detailed and brilliant performance; but the more eloquently Mr. Koussevitzky argued the weaker seemed his client's case. The "Scythian" suite contains some diabolically clever instrumentation, some that is not so clever, and hardly a vestige of vitality or individuality. It is Stravinsky sans ideas. For the second half of his program Mr. Koussevitzky chose Brahms's fourth symphony, a work in which he appeared to less advantage than in anything else he played. The passacaglia movement he handled brilliantly and sonorously, but he played the symphony in general as if it bored him just the least little bit, giving it a scrupulously just, academic performance that was surprisingly uninteresting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 30 1924

MUSIC
By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was additional testimony to the present excellent technical status of the band and to the temperament and individuality of the conductor. Mr. Koussevitzky had a better grip of the situation than on Thursday night; he worked his will more completely in interpretation. The performances, barring an occasional attack which gave evidence, more than anything else, of an almost excessive desire on the part of the men to carry out the wishes of the conductor, were of a very brilliant nature, and the reception of the orchestra and its director by the public was unmistakable endorsement.

The program, with the exception of Brahm's Fourth symphony, consisted of Russian music, most of it of inferior quality. There were four compositions by Mr. Koussevitzky's countrymen. The first was Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," an overture with conventional measures, but always delightful by reason of its zest and sparkle and the joyous lilt of the second theme. This overture could hardly have been played with more kindling spirit and virtuosity by the men.

The overture was followed by the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," the scherzo "Flight of the Bumblebee," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan," and Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite performed for the first time here. The prelude to "Khovantchina" is poor and impotent music. Its best measures suggest what is done in "Boris Godunof" twice as well. The instrumentation is thin, but the musical thought is thinner. Mr Koussevitzky made all that could be made of the work, and the concluding measures furnished a pianissimo such as the patrons of Boston Symphony concerts have not heard since the days of Wilhelm Gericke.

Much had been said in advance of the "Scythian" suite of Prokofieff. The suite is in four movements, "The Adoration of Veles and Ala," "The Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits," "Night," "The Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun." The music is inspired by a conception of a primitive people, their passions, superstitions, ceremonies. Thus the opening movement is an invocation to the Sun-God and a sacrifice to his daughter, the idol Ala; in the second movement the Evil-God summons seven monsters from their realms, and they dance; in the third number the Evil-God comes to Ala in the darkness, and "great harm befalls her." In the final movement Lolly, the hero, pursues the Evil-God to save Ala. He is near to defeat when the Sun-God rises and smites the black spirit.

The finest moment in this suite, as it seems at a first hearing, is the last fifty measures, more or less—the depiction of sunrise. This passage has a certain harshness of outline and a shrill vividness that are not soon forgotten. Sustained tones of trumpets, a pedal point about which there revolve high-clashing sonorities, make the effect. Tone is refracted from one group of instruments to the other. This sun is a barbarian's sun. It rises grimly; it hurls sheaves of light like spears that shatter. The composer in this place hit upon a genuine idea, which he develops masterfully with bold and inexorable logic.

In the section "Night," there are curious colors, momentary softness of shadow, but withal something, again, that is harsh and even macabre. But these are effects rather than ideas, and could embody quite different conceptions. The best elements of this music are elements of color. As a whole it seems to us poor stuff, at best an invention and not an inspiration. This "Scythian" suite was composed in 1914. It followed all of the earlier Stravinsky. it followed "Sacré du printemps" by two years. Twenty years ago it would have been astounding. Today it is principally imitative, and it does not escape the suspicion of sensationalism. Twenty measures of "Sacré du printemps" are more primitive and terrible. Did the thought that primitiveness was fashionable cross the mind of the young and fertile Mr. Prokofieff? He uses an enormous orchestra, he is polytonal when he feels like it, which is much of the time, but he very seldom rings deep and true. There is a certain vigor and bounce in the writing, a youthful impetuousness, but the work is more manufactured than imagined, and we do not believe it ever could have appeared had it not been for Stravinsky.

A more toothsome morsel for the majority seemed the scherzo of the Bumblebee. Not only is this one of the cheapest and most ordinary compositions of Rimsky-Korsakoff's that we know, but it is not music worthy of performance on a symphony program. A man wrote a piece for violin, "L'Abeille," much like this one in figuration and, on the whole, only a little worse. Yet Mr. Koussvitzky put on this catch-trap for applause, and, what is more, repeated it. Neither the applause after the first performance nor the character of the music itself warranted any such procedure, to say nothing of the fact that encores are wholly out of place in a symphonic concert. An episode of this kind should be relegated to "pop" concerts in the Summer time.

The performance of the Brahms symphony was the musical capstone of the concert. Certain details of interpretation, such as the dragging of the tempi in the chorale passage of the passacaglia, invite discussion of the academic kind which need not at this moment detain us. The essential thing is that in breadth, in virility and also beauty of color this was a reading that did admirable justice to the spirit, the form, the classic workmanship of the symphony. It was not a purist's interpretation, but it was a living one, which revealed the beauties of the work and did them no fundamental violence.

The audience remained to the very end of the concert, overcrowding the hall, exhibiting enthusiasm which Mr. Koussevitzky did not permit to expand between the movements of the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 30 1924

WORDS and MUSIC
By DEEMS TAYLOR

ONE concert does not make a conductor, but the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last Thursday night was enough to show that America is richer by the presence of a musician of superlative attainments. Mr. Koussevitzky had a European reputation of almost legendary magnitude to live up to, and the fact that he exceeded the expectations of most of his hearers is the highest possible tribute to his gifts. He brings to the Boston Orchestra a broad catholicity of taste, an extraordinary insight into whatever music he conducts, and a complete mastery of the technique of handling an orchestra. The results are bound to be of absorbing interest and artistic profit not only to Boston but to American music in general. He is welcome!

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
DEC 1 1924

Dinner to Koussevitzky

After the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Thanksgiving night, its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was given a dinner by sixty of his Russian colleagues with whom he had played the double bass at one time or another. They came from orchestras all over the city and in speech and attitude, the greatest conductors and the smallest fiddlers all paid their tribute to the great artist and they all called him by his given name as a sign of love and respect.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER
NOV 30 1924

First Appearance.

Serge Koussevitsky, famous Russian conductor, made his first New York appearance with the Boston symphony orchestra, and Michael Mordkin is back at the winter garden, after an absence of more than a decade. George Arliss is back from London and is rehearsing a Galsworthy play "Old English."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
ENQUIRER
DEC 1 1924

Serge Koussevitsky, famous Russ conductor, made his first New Y appearance with the Boston S phony orchestra and Michael Mord is back at the Winter Garden, afte absence of more than a decade.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
DEC 1 18

There was less matter for serious consideration in the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon than in the entertainment of Thursday evening. Serge Koussevitky, the conductor, was no longer a great unknown, and the music proffered for appreciation opened no new realm of speculation. The Russians possessed the first half of the program, with Glinka's overture to "Ruslan and Ludamilla," Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee" from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan" and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." After the intermission came the fourth symphony of Brahms.

Bumble bees, fairies and other little folk of music travel always in the same class ever since Weber built them an orchestral road and Mendelssohn relaid it. The chief merit of Rimsky-Korsakov's scherzo seemed to be the opportunity it gave the clarinetist to show that he could play a perfect scale. The number was short enough to be repeated, and it was.

The music of Prokofieff, composer of the "Love for Three Oranges," is not entirely unknown here. The Scythian suite shows no variation of style. The ancient barbarians were described by Herodotus and seem to have resembled savage peoples of various other parts of the world. Prokofieff wasted no effort in searching for spiritual subtleties among such persons. A confessed realist, he set out to make an orchestral noise like barbarians celebrating their religious rites.

He needed many instruments, including the now essential stopped trumpet, the celesta, xylophone, piano and harps to paint his picture. Still more did he need the aid of the polytonal system which enabled his four trumpets to screech in several keys at once while other parts of the orchestra were engaged in disseminating entirely independent discords. It was a great disturbance and there was no question that the Scythians were a race of savages who did dire things around their altars. And when the composition had been completed nothing had been published that was new and nothing that was worth while.

Mr. Koussevitky's interpretation of the Brahms symphony—or rather that portion of it which we heard—disclosed no attempt at sacrifice of the composer to the conductor. It was straightforward and honest, clear and intelligent. Possibly the Russian director is less enthusiastic about Brahms than he is about some other masters, but he presented the symphony with respect and with musical insight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN
DEC1 192

A group of notable Gotham folk gave a supper the other evening at the Lido-Venice in honor of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, following the New York performance of the orchestra. Mrs. James Lowell Putnam and Mrs. Richard T. Wilson, both former Bostonians, were of the group giving the affair.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
DEC 1 1924

IN TWO CONCERTS NEW YORK HEARS MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

STIRRED AUDIENCES: PRAISEFUL REVIEWERS

Insight, Imagination, Control and Logic—The Temptation to Overdo—From Vivaldi to Skriabin—Weber, Debussy, Brahms as They Emerge from the Conductor's Hand—The Orchestra as He Uses It—The Bee Buzzes Anew

CONDUCTING at two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly received and favorably judged by both audiences and reviewers. Alike on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon last, the audience filled Carnegie Hall to the last seat and the last foothold of standing room; while on either occasion it teemed with applause. Furthermore, if The Herald-Tribune is believable, "Boston Symphony seats are now almost as scarce as they used to be in those fabulous pre-war days when the concerts of the Boston organization were the chief and shining events of our orchestral season." As for the reviewers, each and every one of them gave testimony according to his lights, as shall appear hereunder. For final clearing of the ground, be it written that Mr. Koussevitzky's program on Thursday composed Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor; the Overture to Weber's "Oberon"; Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes"; Honegger's "Pacific, 231"; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." On Saturday he ranged through the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; the prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; the "Scherzo of the Bee" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan"; Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Briefly and Firmly

One concert does not make a conductor, but the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last Thursday was enough to show that America is richer by the presence of a musician of superlative attainments. Mr. Koussevitzky had a European reputation of almost legendary magnitude to live up to, and the fact that he exceeded the expectations of most of his hearers is the highest possible tribute to his gifts. He brings to the Boston Orchestra a broad catholicity of taste, an extraordinary insight into whatever music he conducts, and a complete mastery of the technique of handling an orchestra. The results are bound to be of absorbing interest and artistic profit not only to Boston but to American music in general. [The World

An Imperfect Instrument

The impression Mr. Koussevitzky made was all the more profound because he was not playing upon a perfect instrument. The Boston Orchestra, despite Mr. Monteux's heroic labors of the past few years, has not regained the wonderful plasticity and tonal beauty that it had under Karl Muck. The brasses are nicely balanced but a little wanting in richness, the other wind choirs, while they number famous artists in their ranks, lack complete homogeneity, and the strings, clear as they are, remain a little cold in quality. Only an authentic miracle, of course, would have corrected these shortcomings in the few weeks Mr. Koussevitzky has been in Boston. What he has evidently done is to concentrate his energies upon getting the finest possible playing out of the orchestra under his hand, reserving radical efforts to refine the instrument itself for a time of greater leisure. [The World

In Survey

Mr. Koussevitzky will not be numbered among "the prima donnas of the baton" for the simple reason that he is a virile, forceful and withal an analytical conductor, whose interpretations combined sweep and power with searching insight and broad musical imagination. The program gave him room for an exhibition of his command of styles. Vivaldi's Concerto was superbly perfomed. The orchestra delivered it with breadth of tempi, illuminating clarity and nicely adjusted balance of polyphony and unfailingly beautiful phrasing. The whoe composition breathed the breath of life, but never for an instant lost dignity of progress or architectural lines.

The overture to Oberon is music throbbing with the fervor and gallantry of the romantic movement. The conductor's reading was unquestionably more analytical than those to which this public is accustomed. He made his points openly; but when one had adjusted his mind to this one received the right impression of instrumental splendor and variety of moods. The contrasts of themes and movements were strongly marked, but the spirit of the piece was published. And the tonal magnificence of the orchestra was revealed in all its glory.

Debussy's Nocturnes served to illustrate the disposition of Mr. Koussevitzky toward the romanticism of modern France and the disclosure was far from being the least interesting contribution to the evening's pleasure. The clouds of Debussy are often gray and foggy. Under the newcomer's baton they resumed their proper character. They were pearly, delicate, gently floating, mysterious. The playing of this number was a masterpiece of gossamer transparency and exquisite finish. "Fêtes" was splendidly festal. The aerial procession has never been played here with such a masterly development of the long crescendo. [The Sun

Checks and Balances

Mr. Koussevitzky has two outstanding traits that make for vividness: he has a dramatizing imagination, and he has a passion for accentuation. Often—very often, indeed—this vividness of conception and of treatment produces results of the most memorable sort. We have never, for example, heard that marvelous effect in the middle of Debussy's "Fêtes," the sudden mysterious hushing of the music in preparation for the advance of the chimerical procession, more impressively achieved. And in moments like the incandescent climax of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" Mr. Koussevitzky puts over superbly what the music invites him to accomplish. But too often his passion for italicizing everything has unfortunate results. It seems difficult for Mr. Koussevitzky to allow the music to "breave natural," like the colored lady in the story. If the score calls for a piano passage, Mr. Koussevitzky turns it into a pianissimo that is barely audible. If Weber wishes us to hear the horns of Elfland faintly blowing, Mr. Koussevitzky is not content until the elves have vanished behind the farthest hill. If Weber writes "dolce" under the A-major clarinet theme in the Allegro of his Overture, Mr. Koussevitzky has his player dawdle over the melody as if it were a languishing Andante. The voluptuous swoonings of Skriabin in his dreams of ecstasy become, under his sympathetic care, merely a series of relaxing naps, wherein the patient rests easily, while the waiting audience stirs restlessly and wonders when the eight horns are going to stand up and bring things to an issue.

Yet there is no resisting the burning intensity of the man. Even when he languishes unduly, as with Scriabin, he languishes through excess of sympathy, not because his own vitality is relaxed. Clarity of conception, quick sensibility, a comprehensive grasp of structure, a fusing and projecting imagination—these virtues are Mr. Koussevitzky's, beyond denial. There are no dead areas in his brain; the whole man is flamingly responsive and alive. Even when you are convinced that he is wrong—even when you are sure that the song was not meant to go that way—you are fain to listen, though you dissent and disapprove. His misconceptions are more engrossing than the accuracies of less fiery and headstrong spirits: for he has genius—misguided and wayward, at times; but unmistakable and authentic, and, at its best, magnificent. [The Herald-Tribune

Control and Logic

Control, which the merely sensational conductor always lacks, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's strongest points; and no one who heard the strings of the orchestra phrase the long-drawn-out melody of the adagio [in Vivaldi's Concerto] could doubt that here was a conductor who, however deeply he may feel a piece of music, however thoroughly he may be immersed in it, yet paradoxically stands outside it, seeing it as a sculptor sees a statue, and modelling it as a sculptor models.

In the Overture to "Oberon" and the "Clouds" and "Fêtes" of Debussy we had another seeker of soft lines and delicate washes. He tuned the orchestra down, in the prelude to "Oberon," to the finest pianissimo imaginable, yet within the pianissimo were a dozen degrees of depth of tint. In his phrasing of the clarinet-melody some listeners may have felt a first impulse to disagree with him. The pace may have been rather slow for some tastes; it was certainly slower than most conductors allow themselves at this point. But here, as on other similar occasions, Mr. Koussevitzky plays the operatic overture with his mind intent on the opera itself. The clarinet-melody he fills with all the emotion of the scene in which it appears; and his slow tempo has the advantage that in the later stages of the overture the theme and what grows out of it can be made to express a very dramatic acceleration of the pulse. Granting Mr. Koussevitzky's premises, every later stage of the argument follows with an irresistible logic.

Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" has always been one of the pieces in which Mr. Koussevitzky has excelled. In few other pages can we study so completely his union of perfection of detail with a steady, unrelaxing grasp of the whole. . . . The music makes its effect by an endless series of harmonic startings that are always checked just on the verge of realization. It is this that makes the work so hard a problem for the conductor; he has to convey to the hearer the sense of still pressing on and on through each of these momentary setbacks. Mr. Koussevitzky makes us conscious of the one big line embracing it all. [The Evening Post

Spirit and Truth

A hundred times (sic) we have heard those extraordinary opening progressions of the wind instruments in the "Clouds"—certainly a very quintessence of the genius of Debussy. Never before had they the precise surface, the clearness, but softness of timbre that Mr. Koussevitsky, with the masterly aid of the wind players of the orchestra, attained. There was similar fineness of feeling in the solo for English horn. It usually stands out like a black charcoal stroke against a delicately shaded background. Now this exquisite timbre was sketched against the gray of the other instruments as only a deeper intensity that sometimes emerged from and sometimes mingled with them. And this, too, was fortunate: the movement was not dragged, and it was never heavy.

The performance of Brahms's symphony was the musical capstone of the second concert. Certain details of interpretation such as the dragging of the tempi in the choiale passage of the passacaglia, invite discussion of the academic kind which need not at this moment detain us. The essential thing is that in breadth, in virility and also beauty of color this was a reading that did admirable justice to the spirit, the form, the classic workmanship of the symphony. It was not a purist's interpretation, but it was a living one, which revealed the beauties of the music and did them no fundamental violence. [The Times

Bow Wow, Wow!

A more toothsome morsel for the majority seemed the "Scherzo of the Bee." Not only is this one of the cheapest and most ordinary compositions of Rimsky-Korsakov that we know, but it is not music worthy of performance on a symphony programme. A man wrote a piece for violin, "L'Abeille," much like this one in figuration and, on the whole, only a little worse. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky put on this catch-trap for applause, and, what is more, repeated it, neither the applause after the first performance nor the character of the music itself warranted any such procedure, to say nothing of the fact that encores are wholly out of place in a symphonic concert. An episode of this kind should be relegated to "Pop" concerts in the summer time. [The Times.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Telegram DEC 1 1924
New York City

Koussevitzky Again.

In the way of telltale music the program which Serge Koussevitzky undertook Saturday afternoon at the second Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall offered only the fourth symphony of Brahms. This the newcomer chose to reserve for the last, leaving open the first half of the bill to four specimens of assorted Russian handicraft ranging from fairly good to very, very bad, and hardly calculated to search the recesses of a conductor's mind and spirit. The overture to Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmilla" began the ceremonies, followed by Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" prelude, and an orchestral scherzo called "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan," paved the way for the "Scythian Suite" of that contemporary young flibbertigibbet, Sergei Prokofieff, which has taken its time to reach this city. In Paris they hissed it a long while ago.

There was no indication this time that Mr. Koussevitzky endured at any moment the ravages of nerves. Always he appeared completely master of the situation, to say nothing of himself. He went about his business urbanely, very deliberately and managed all his effects with imperturbable shrewdness. He knew there was an audience in back of him as surely as he knew there was an orchestra in front of him. He has plenty, outwardly, to engage the attention of impressionable beholders and he neglected at no time to engage it. In the blithe overture of Glinka he even permitted himself Dr. Muck's little piece of swank in ceasing to beat time altogether and letting the orchestra go it a few dozen bars all alone.

And it was a fine performance he gave this pleasant, spirited, inexacting piece—admirably buoyant and mettlesome. Likewise he made much of the "Khovantchina" prelude which, though one of the better pages of that highly uneven and torpid opera, leans heavily on the conductor's skill to make itself effectively felt. In Mr. Koussevitzky's very sympathetic hands it achieved a presentation that combined rare clarity of perspective with a finely wrought scheme of detail. Nevertheless the conductor's trick of anxiously refining away pianissimi to the vanishing point assumed more than once the aspect of a highly sophisticated mannerism. To what purpose a pianissimo that nobody can hear?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo, with its muted strings and purling clarinets, is an unashamedly catch-penny affair of infallible, predigested effects that do not require a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's technical equipment or an orchestra like the Boston Symphony to carry them to sensational issue. Nevertheless, the audience had much joy of the piece. Mr. Koussevitzky made the players rise and then, judging this distinction insufficient, repeated the trifle. Prokofieff was nothing so inoffensive. This gentleman, probably the supreme false alarm among modernists, has aimed in his "Scythian" savageries at a species of "Sacre du Printemps" of his own. But the outstanding idea propagated by the dreary affair is rather of Mendelssohn pretending to be Edgar Varese.

The symphony of Brahms took the measure of Serge Koussevitzky more ruthlessly, perhaps, than anything he had essayed here up to that moment. The interpretation, for all it had of breadth, clarity and technical command.

213
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
DEC 1 1924

Music — Ernest Newman's Daily Column

Boston Symphony Second Concert

AT SATURDAY'S CONCERT of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky again seemed to be bent on proving that his sympathies embraced the most widely different styles. He gave us a performance of Brahms's fourth symphony that was vital throughout,—broad, massive and lucid, with some exquisite playing in the andante, and, in the curious, sardonic scherzo, a jocosity that was rough but never clumsy. Some minor Russian things—the overture to "Rousslan and Lindmilla," the prelude to Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's dainty little "Flight of the Bumble Bee"—served principally to reveal the extraordinary variety of nuance that Mr. Koussevitzky can draw from his orchestra.

The performance—a vivid and stirring one—of Prokoviev's "Scythian Suite" was apparently the first in New York. The work shows that singular young man at something like his best. There is a lack of fundamental brain power in Prokoviev that sometimes takes the form of downright silliness, as in some of his piano pieces and in the ballet "Chout," and sometimes of a childlikeness that is quite charming, as in some of his piano concertos. But he is not to be summed up in a phrase. He has humor, and every now and then he will write a page or two that is genuinely big.

But always we come back to the lack of subsoil, so to speak, in his thinking. When we take away from the "Scythian Suite" the skill of the scoring and the occasional energy of the rhythm, we are left with a mind of the type with which Russian music of a certain kind has made us rather too familiar. The mentality is a narrow one, from the Western point of view. We feel, as we sometimes do with Stravinsky, that here is a barbarian using the latest technique of the modern orchestra to express the most rudimentary concepts. Prokoviev, as is the way with minds of this kind, relies overmuch on mere repetition of phrases, figures, or even single tones. Stravinsky, in the "Sacre du Printemps," has shown us what nervous excitement can be generated by this method. But the effects are too purely physical to last with us.

Prokoviev is not an imitator of Stravinsky. He has a genuine individuality; but the racial method is much the same in both men's music. This new and almost savage energy cannot be forced into the veins of our over-intellectualized European music without rejuvenating it; but the older organism will instinctively reject what is of no use to it in it. The Western ideal is continuous organic thought. It has taken centuries to develop something of this kind in our music, and we may depend upon it that we are not going back now to the helpless reiteration of fragments that is the sure sign of all primitive music. But the "Scythian Suite" is profoundly interesting, as the "Sacre" is, not so much for what it achieves as for what it stands for and strives after.

The League of Composers' Concert

At the Klaw Theatre, on Sunday night, the League of Composers gave us a concert of modern works that turned out to be a very mixed grill. Some of it was chamber music; the rest was lethal chamber music. Head and shoulders above everything else in the program stood Stravinsky's concertino for string quartet. He has succeeded no better here than in some others of his later works in getting a perfect fusion of all the elements of his style. When he abandons himself to that desire for convulsive rhythmical effects that is a general obsession with him, his writing becomes angular and disjointed, and his harmony, in particular, acquires an arthritic stiffness. When he is not so self-conscious, he writes with admirable ease, fluency and roundness.

The sonata for violin and piano of the younger Tcherepnine is rather an infantile piece of work for that very clever young man; he has done much better things. Few of the other works amounted to very much: one can only record that there were a couple of "Assyrian Prayers" for tenor (Mr. Judson House) and chamber orchestra by Mr. Frederick Jacobi, a couple of Stravinsky songs, three songs by Castelnuovo-Tedesco (Mme. Delaunois), and a new work by one Fritz Klein, "Die Maschine" (for chamber orchestra), that was described as a satire on polytonality and dynamism. It proved to be as dull-witted an attempt at humor as Germany has ever sent us. It was not merely that one could not laugh with Herr Klein; one could not even laugh at him. There are at least a million students at the conservatoires who could do better than this.

Two "Fragments for Chamber Orchestra" by Honegger were interesting. The first, "L'Ombre," an expressive piece of writing, shows us the Honegger who is at heart a classic. The other piece added to the usual string and wind instruments four wine bottles, upon which a gentleman with a couple of little drumsticks did some fascinating things. It was the first time, for instance, that I have heard a bottle glissando. In the later stages of the composition, the player kept up a loud continuous tintinnabulation on his bottles. No explanation was given us of the title of the piece, "L'Homme et la Mer"; but it seemed to me the musical description of a scene in a restaurant. The band was playing quite nicely; but at one of the tables was a bibulous gentleman who, after emptying his four bottles, was still thirsty. The waitress,—probably her name was Lorelei—was a long time answering his call, but he was determined to get another drink even if he had to keep on ringing that damn bell all night.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
DEC 1 1924

IN TWO CONCERTS NEW YORK HEARS MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

STIRRED AUDIENCES: PRAISEFUL REVIEWERS

Insight, Imagination, Control and Logic —The Temptation to Overdo—From Vivaldi to Skriabin—Weber, Debussy, Brahms as They Emerge from the Conductor's Hand—The Orchestra as He Uses It—The Bee Buzzes Anew

CONDUCTING at two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly received and favorably judged by both audiences and reviewers. Alike on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon last, the audience filled Carnegie Hall to the last seat and the last foothold of standing room; while on either occasion it teemed with applause. Furthermore, if The Herald-Tribune is believable, "Boston Symphony seats are now almost as scarce as they used to be in those fabulous pre-war days when the concerts of the Boston organization were the chief and shining events of our orchestral season." As for the reviewers, each and every one of them gave testimony according to his lights, as shall appear hereunder. For final clearing of the ground, be it written that Mr. Koussevitzky's program on Thursday composed Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor; the Overture to Weber's "Oberon"; Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes"; Honegger's "Pacific, 231"; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." On Saturday he ranged through the Overture to Glinka's opera, "Ruslan and Ludmilla"; the prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; the "Scherzo of the Bee" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Tsar Saltan"; Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Briefly and Firmly

One concert does not make a conductor, but the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last Thursday was enough to show that America is richer by the presence of a musician of superlative attainments. Mr. Koussevitzky had a European reputation of almost legendary magnitude to live up to, and the fact that he exceeded the expectations of most of his hearers is the highest possible tribute to his gifts. He brings to the Boston Orchestra a broad catholicity of taste, an extraordinary insight into whatever music he conducts, and a complete mastery of the technique of handling an orchestra. The results are bound to be of absorbing interest and artistic profit not only to Boston but to American music in general. [The World

An Imperfect Instrument

The impression Mr. Koussevitzky made was all the more profound because he was not playing upon a perfect instrument. The Boston Orchestra, despite Mr. Monteux's heroic labors of the past few years, has not regained the wonderful plasticity and tonal beauty that it had under Karl Muck. The brasses are nicely balanced but a little wanting in richness, the other wind choirs, while they number famous artists in their ranks, lack complete homogeneity, and the strings, clear as they are, remain a little cold in quality. Only an authentic miracle, of course, would have corrected these shortcomings in the few weeks Mr. Koussevitzky has been in Boston. What he has evidently done is to concentrate his energies upon getting the finest possible playing out of the orchestra under his hand, reserving radical efforts to refine the instrument itself for a time of greater leisure. [The World

In Survey

Mr. Koussevitzky will not be numbered among "the prima donnas of the baton" for the simple reason that he is a virile, forceful and withal an analytical conductor, whose interpretations combined sweep and power with searching insight and broad musical imagination. The program gave him room for an exhibition of his command of styles. Vivaldi's Concerto was superbly perfomed. The orchestra delivered it with breadth of tempi, illuminating clarity and nicely adjusted balance of polyphony and unfailingly beautiful phrasing. The whoe composition breathed the breath of life, but never for an instant lost dignity of progress or architectural lines.

The overture to Oberon is music throbbing with the fervor and gallantry of the romantic movement. The conductor's reading was unquestionably more analytical than those to which this public is accustomed. He made his points openly; but when one had adjusted his mind to this one received the right impression of instrumental splendor and variety of moods. The contrasts of themes and movements were strongly marked, but the spirit of the piece was published. And the tonal magnificence of the orchestra was revealed in all its glory.

Debussy's Nocturnes served to illustrate the disposition of Mr. Koussevitzky toward the romanticism of modern France and the disclosure was far from being the least interesting contribution to the evening's pleasure. The clouds of Debussy are often gray and foggy. Under the newcomer's baton they resumed their proper character. They were pearly, delicate, gently floating, mysterious. The playing of this number was a masterpiece of gossamer transparency and exquisite finish. "Fetes" was splendidly festal. The aerial procession has never been played here with such a masterly development of the long crescendo. [The Sun

Checks and Balances

Mr. Koussevitzky has two outstanding traits that make for vividness: he has a dramatizing imagination, and he has a passion for accentuation. Often—very often, indeed—this vividness of conception and of treatment produces results of the most memorable sort. We have never, for example, heard that marvelous effect in the middle of Debussy's "Fêtes," the sudden mysterious hushing of the music in preparation for the advance of the chimerical procession, more impressively achieved. And in moments like the incandescent climax of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" Mr. Koussevitzky puts over superbly what the music invites him to accomplish. But too often his passion for italicizing everything has unfortunate results. It seems difficult for Mr. Koussevitzky to allow the music to "breave natural," like the colored lady in the story. If the score calls for a piano passage, Mr. Koussevitzky turns it into a pianissimo that is barely audible. If Weber wishes us to hear the horns of Elfland faintly blowing, Mr. Koussevitzky is not content until the elves have vanished behind the farthest hill. If Weber writes "dolce" under the A-major clarinet theme in the Allegro of his Overture, Mr. Koussevitzky has his player dawdle over the melody as if it were a languishing Andante. The voluptuous swoonings of Skriabin in his dreams of ecstasy become, under his sympathetic care, merely a series of relaxing naps, wherein the patient rests easily, while the waiting audience stirs restlessly and wonders when the eight horns are going to stand up and bring things to an issue.

Yet there is no resisting the burning intensity of the man. Even when he languishes unduly, as with Scriabin, he languishes through excess of sympathy, not because his own vitality is relaxed. Clarity of conception, quick sensibility, a comprehensive grasp of structure, a fusing and projecting imagination—these virtues are Mr. Koussevitzky's, beyond denial. There are no dead areas in his brain; the whole man is flamingly responsive and alive. Even when you are convinced that he is wrong—even when you are sure that the song was not meant to go that way—you are fain to listen, though you dissent and disapprove. His misconceptions are more engrossing than the accuracies of less fiery and headstrong spirits: for he has genius—misguided and wayward, at times; but unmistakable and authentic, and, at its best, magnificent. [The Herald-Tribune

Control and Logic

Control, which the merely sensational conductor always lacks, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's strongest points; and no one who heard the strings of the orchestra phrase the long-drawn-out melody of the adagio [in Vivaldi's Concerto] could doubt that here was a conductor who, however deeply he may feel a piece of music, however thoroughly he may be immersed in it, yet paradoxically stands outside it, seeing it as a sculptor sees a statue, and modelling it as a sculptor models.

In the Overture to "Oberon" and the "Clouds" and "Fêtes" of Debussy we had another seeker of soft lines and delicate washes. He tuned the orchestra down, in the prelude to "Oberon," to the finest pianissimo imaginable, yet within the pianissimo were a dozen degrees of depth of tint. In his phrasing of the clarinet-melody some listeners may have felt a first impulse to disagree with him. The pace may have been rather slow for some tastes; it was certainly slower than most conductors allow themselves at this point. But here, as on other similar occasions, Mr. Koussevitzky plays the operatic overture with his mind intent on the opera itself. The clarinet-melody he fills with all the emotion of the scene in which it appears; and his slow tempo has the advantage that in the later stages of the overture the theme and what grows out of it can be made to express a very dramatic acceleration of the pulse. Granting Mr. Koussevitzky's premises, every later stage of the argument follows with an irresistible logic.

Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" has always been one of the pieces in which Mr. Koussevitzky has excelled. In few other pages can we study so completely his union of perfection of detail with a steady, unrelaxing grasp of the whole. . . . The music makes its effect by an endless series of harmonic startings that are always checked just on the verge of realization. It is this that makes the work so hard a problem for the conductor; he has to convey to the hearer the sense of still pressing on and on through each of these momentary setbacks. Mr. Koussevitzky makes us conscious of the one big line embracing it all. [The Evening Post

Spirit and Truth

A hundred times (sic) we have heard those extraordinary opening progressions of the wind instruments in the "Clouds"—certainly a very quintessence of the genius of Debussy. Never before had they the precise surface, the clearness, but softness of timbre that Mr. Koussevitsky, with the masterly aid of the wind players of the orchestra, attained. There was similar fineness of feeling in the solo for English horn. It usually stands out like a black charcoal stroke against a delicately shaded background. Now this exquisite timbre was sketched against the gray of the other instruments as only a deeper intensity that sometimes emerged from and sometimes mingled with them. And this, too, was fortunate: the movement was not dragged, and it was never heavy.

The performance of Brahms's symphony was the musical capstone of the second concert. Certain details of interpretation such as the dragging of the tempi in the choiale passage of the passacaglia, invite discussion of the academic kind which need not at this moment detain us. The essential thing is that in breadth, in virility and also beauty of color this was a reading that did admirable justice to the spirit, the form, the classic workmanship of the symphony. It was not a purist's interpretation, but it was a living one, which revealed the beauties of the music and did them no fundamental violence. [The Times

Bow Wow, Wow!

A more toothsome morsel for the majority seemed the "Scherzo of the Bee." Not only is this one of the cheapest and most ordinary compositions of Rimsky-Korsakov that we know, but it is not music worthy of performance on a symphony programme. A man wrote a piece for violin, "L'Abeille," much like this one in figuration and, on the whole, only a little worse. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky put on this catch-trap for applause, and, what is more, repeated it, neither the applause after the first performance nor the character of the music itself warranted any such procedure, to say nothing of the fact that encores are wholly out of place in a symphonic concert. An episode of this kind should be relegated to "Pop" concerts in the summer time. [The Times.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Telegram DEC 1 1924
New York City

Koussevitzky Again.

In the way of telltale music the program which Serge Koussevitzky undertook Saturday afternoon at the second Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall offered only the fourth symphony of Brahms. This the newcomer chose to reserve for the last, leaving open the first half of the bill to four specimens of assorted Russian handicraft ranging from fairly good to very, very bad, and hardly calculated to search the recesses of a conductor's mind and spirit. The overture to Glinka's "Ruslan and Ludmilla" began the ceremonies, followed by Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" prelude, and an orchestral scherzo called "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan," paved the way for the "Scythian Suite" of that contemporary young flibbertigibbet, Sergei Prokofieff, which has taken its time to reach this city. In Paris they hissed it a long while ago.

There was no indication this time that Mr. Koussevitzky endured at any moment the ravages of nerves. Always he appeared completely master of the situation, to say nothing of himself. He went about his business urbanely, very deliberately and managed all his effects with imperturbable shrewdness. He knew there was an audience in back of him as surely as he knew there was an orchestra in front of him. He has plenty, outwardly, to engage the attention of impressionable beholders and he neglected at no time to engage it. In the blithe overture of Glinka he even permitted himself Dr. Muck's little piece of swank in ceasing to beat time altogether and letting the orchestra go it a few dozen bars all alone.

And it was a fine performance he gave this pleasant, spirited, inexacting piece—admirably buoyant and mettlesome. Likewise he made much of the "Khovantchina" prelude which, though one of the better pages of that highly uneven and torpid opera, leans heavily on the conductor's skill to make itself effectively felt. In Mr. Koussevitzky's very sympathetic hands it achieved a presentation that combined rare clarity of perspective with a finely wrought scheme of detail. Nevertheless the conductor's trick of anxiously refining away pianissimi to the vanishing point assumed more than once the aspect of a highly sophisticated mannerism. To what purpose a pianissimo that nobody can hear?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's scherzo, with its muted strings and purling clarinets, is an unashamedly catch-penny affair of infallible, predigested effects that do not require a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's technical equipment or an orchestra like the Boston Symphony to carry them to sensational issue. Nevertheless, the audience had much joy of the piece. Mr. Koussevitzky made the players rise and then, judging this distinction insufficient, repeated the trifle. Prokofieff was nothing so inoffensive. This gentleman, probably the supreme false alarm among modernists, has aimed in his "Scythian" savageries at a species of "Sacre du Printemps" of his own. But the outstanding idea propagated by the dreary affair is rather of Mendelssohn pretending to be Edgar Varese.

The symphony of Brahms took the measure of Serge Koussevitzky more ruthlessly, perhaps, than anything he had essayed here up to that moment. The interpretation, for all it had of breadth, clarity and technical command.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
POST
DEC 1 1924

213

Music — Ernest Newman's Daily Column

Boston Symphony Second Concert

AT SATURDAY'S CONCERT of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky again seemed to be bent on proving that his sympathies embraced the most widely different styles. He gave us a performance of Brahms's fourth symphony that was vital throughout,—broad, massive and lucid, with some exquisite playing in the andante, and, in the curious, sardonic scherzo, a jocosity that was rough but never clumsy. Some minor Russian things—the overture to "Rousslan and Lindmilla," the prelude to Khovantchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's dainty little "Flight of the Bumble Bee"—served principally to reveal the extraordinary variety of nuance that Mr. Koussevitzky can draw from his orchestra.

The performance—a vivid and stirring one—of Prokoviev's "Scythian Suite" was apparently the first in New York. The work shows that singular young man at something like his best. There is a lack of fundamental brain power in Prokoviev that sometimes takes the form of downright silliness, as in some of his piano pieces and in the ballet "Chout," and sometimes of a childlikeness that is quite charming, as in some of his piano concertos. But he is not to be summed up in a phrase. He has humor, and every now and then he will write a page or two that is genuinely big.

But always we come back to the lack of subsoil, so to speak, in his thinking. When we take away from the "Scythian Suite" the skill of the scoring and the occasional energy of the rhythm, we are left with a mind of the type with which Russian music of a certain kind has made us rather too familiar. The mentality is a narrow one, from the Western point of view. We feel, as we sometimes do with Stravinsky, that here is a barbarian using the latest technique of the modern orchestra to express the most rudimentary concepts. Prokoviev, as is the way with minds of this kind, relies overmuch on mere repetition of phrases, figures, or even single tones. Stravinsky, in the "Sacre du Printemps," has shown us what nervous excitement can be generated by this method. But the effects are too purely physical to last with us.

Prokoviev is not an imitator of Stravinsky. He has a genuine individuality; but the racial method is much the same in both men's music. This new and almost savage energy cannot be forced into the veins of our over-intellectualized European music without rejuvenating it; but the older organism will instinctively reject what is of no use to it in it. The Western ideal is continuous organic thought. It has taken centuries to develop something of this kind in our music, and we may depend upon it that we are not going back now to the helpless reiteration of fragments that is the sure sign of all primitive music. But the "Scythian Suite" is profoundly interesting, as the "Sacre" is, not so much for what it achieves as for what it stands for and strives after.

The League of Composers' Concert

At the Klaw Theatre, on Sunday night, the League of Composers gave us a concert of modern works that turned out to be a very mixed grill. Some of it was chamber music; the rest was lethal chamber music. Head and shoulders above everything else in the program stood Stravinsky's concertino for string quartet. He has succeeded no better here than in some others of his later works in getting a perfect fusion of all the elements of his style. When he abandons himself to that desire for convulsive rhythmical effects that is a general obsession with him, his writing becomes angular and disjointed, and his harmony, in particular, acquires an arthritic stiffness. When he is not so self-conscious, he writes with admirable ease, fluency and roundness.

The sonata for violin and piano of the younger Tcherepnine is rather an infantile piece of work for that very clever young man; he has done much better things. Few of the other works amounted to very much: one can only record that there were a couple of "Assyrian Prayers" for tenor (Mr. Judson House) and chamber orchestra by Mr. Frederick Jacobi, a couple of Stravinsky songs, three songs by Castelnuovo-Tedesco (Mme. Delaunois), and a new work by one Fritz Klein, "Die Maschine" (for chamber orchestra), that was described as a satire on polytonality and dynamism. It proved to be as dull-witted an attempt at humor as Germany has ever sent us. It was not merely that one could not laugh with Herr Klein; one could not even laugh at him. There are at least a million students at the conservatoires who could do better than this.

Two "Fragments for Chamber Orchestra" by Honegger were interesting. The first, "L'Ombre," an expressive piece of writing, shows us the Honegger who is at heart a classic. The other piece added to the usual string and wind instruments four wine bottles, upon which a gentleman with a couple of little drumsticks did some fascinating things. It was the first time, for instance, that I have heard a bottle glissando. In the later stages of the composition, the player kept up a loud continuous tintinnabulation on his bottles. No explanation was given us of the title of the piece, "L'Homme et la Mer"; but it seemed to me the musical description of a scene in a restaurant. The band was playing quite nicely; but at one of the tables was a bibulous gentleman who, after emptying his four bottles, was still thirsty. The waitress,—probably her name was Lorelei—was a long time answering his call, but he was determined to get another drink even if he had to keep on ringing that damn bell all night.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

214

(Other Rotteikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
DEC 1 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY AGAIN; THREE PIANISTS

Rachmaninoff, Bauer and Adela Verne Heard in Concerts Over the Week-End.

A little compendium of the development of Russian music, with Brahms as a kind of immense afterpiece, was the scheme of Serge Koussevitzky's second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The audience on Saturday, as at this new conductor's debut, was as large as the place would hold and quite as indubitably impressed. He has now unmistakably convinced the musical element of the town that he is an intensely interesting batonier—an exceptionally spirited and composedly alert orchestra leader, a virile personality.

It may seem a bit supererogatory, after noting that much, to add that Mr. Koussevitzky is also a provocatively intelligent programme-builder; but the importance of this matter ought to be patent enough not to have it appear at all superfluous.

The programme of this second concert took one from Glinka through Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and Serge Prokofieff, and whilst there was no great amount of the music of any of them except Mr. Prokofieff, there was enough to suggest the seed and efflorescence of that astonishing nineteenth century renaissance in Russian music and its tendencies to-day. Thereupon Mr. Koussevitzky turned to the German music of Brahms and, as we happen to believe, the finest and most completely representative Brahms—the passacaglia symphony, otherwise the Fourth.

Practically all of the Russian music was unfamiliar here, although it had already been played in Boston. (Thank the lord Mr. Koussevitzky believes in novelty). Glinka was represented by the well-known overture to "Rouslan and Ludmilla," but Moussorgsky, by the hitherto unplayed prelude to "Khovantchina," Rimsky by "The Flight of the Bee" from his opera, "Tzar Saltan," and Prokofieff, by his "Scythian" suite.

AN ORCHESTRAL ENCORE.

The Moussorgsky piece, which is intended to suggest sunrise brightening upon the Kremlin Square in Moscow, and does so with an astounding economy of means, is unmistakable Moussorgsky, and just as unmistakably a testimony to the help Rimsky-Korsakov's orchestrating hand was to him. Mr. Koussevitzky gave a lovely atmospheric performance of the prelude, as he did of the more obvious piece of Rimsky. The latter lasts but a couple of minutes, and is the sort of thing that a man like Rimsky could toss off without the least trouble in the world. It is a muted-string piece of suggestion, prettily conventional. Mr. Koussevitzky repeated it on what seemed to us very little persuasion.

Mr. Prokofieff received vastly more at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands than we think he deserved. For this "Scythian" suite of his seems to us fifth-rate or worse. Like some of the rest of his output, it sets up pretensions to a certain esoteric significance—a part of it, indeed, is supposed to be touched with a bit of extravagant eroticism—but this young composer has about as much subtlety in his musical make-up as a fried egg, so his "Scythian" suite is both superficial and utterly harmless. As a fact, this music, like everything else of Prokofieff's we have ever listened to, is nine-tenths imitation and one-tenth blah. In the present instance (and in spite of all Mr. Koussevitzky's efforts) the nine-tenths was a worn and dull copy of Stravinsky and the one-tenth was childish.

After the conductor left the Russians and plunged into the Brahms symphony we rather lost our enthusiasm. Not that it wasn't quite orthodox Brahms; it was—and that was the trouble with it—was too orthodox. Its tempi were pretty much always correct and nearly always too evenly literal. Its accents were always impeccably in the right place and the music as a whole moved more or less impressively from beginning to end. But this is Brahms's song of exultant well-being; his triumphant but conservative credo, and unless exultance trambles on its lips, the thing remains superb but a little smug, and afflicts you with dissent, if not disbelief.

It seemed to us that Mr. Koussevitzky substituted, or in any case, offered sonority instead of fervor, meticulous plan instead of urge and surge; in short, fire without heat. So we didn't quite believe in his Brahms. We await his Beethoven—preferably the Seventh Symphony—with a good deal of curiosity.—L. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 1 1924

KOUSSEVITZSKY.

Pierre Monteux, French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gone and the Russian, Serge Koussevitzsky rules in his stead: and the critical reviews of the orchestra's work under the new conductor pretty generally agree in according the crown of genius to him. That he has not yet had enough time with the orchestra to develop its powers along his own lines of interpretation is conceded, but an orchestra of the quality of the Boston organization can give any capable conductor good opportunity to show his powers even with comparatively few rehearsals. It may naturally be expected that as conductor and players get better acquainted finer playing and more delicate shades of interpretation will follow. In the meantime it is good to feel that the new conductor is likely to prove a most important figure in America's musical life.

It goes without saying that orchestral conductors ordinarily have been players in orchestras before taking up the responsibilities of conducting, although there are some outstanding exceptions to the rule. Walter Damrosch, dean of conductors in America, began as a conductor of opera full-fledged because of the death of his father; he was a thoroughly grounded musician, of course, and a pianist of marked attainments. And another pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, has taken to conducting without actual experience in playing in an orchestra although of course he has had very long and ardous experience playing with orchestras under many different conductors. These are mere passing examples of the exceptions to the general rule of players in orchestras qualifying through that work for conductorships. Most of the men now lifting batons over orchestras the world over are players themselves —many of them violinists, some flutists, some 'cellists, but so far as any record at hand goes to show the new conductor of the Boston Symphony is the first double-bass virtuouso to become a leader.

There have been very few players of the unwieldy double-bass who have qualified in the ranks of the virtuousi, although of necessity — great orchestras demanding fine artists — there have been many not only capable but splended players of the largest of the viols. But in musical history few very outstanding players of the bass-viol have been known and it is said that Mr. Koussevitzsky belongs in this select company. He comes to America now, however, to do something greater and finer than playing on any one instrument however large and however and unusually difficult. He comes to play on many instruments as one; to make the minds and genius of many men interpret in the wonders of sound the genius of many other men, dead and living, as he is able to read their thoughts expressed on the printed scores. If he has genius himself (and it may safely be assumed that he has else he could not have reached his present position in the world of music) with the aid of his many players he will wonderfully sound, for those who can understand, the glorious music of one great instrument, the orchestra; his own ideas will go into the interpretations of the music he plays; his own deep studies will have their fruit in the renditions of the classics that he will offer.

Mr. Koussevitzsky has been made welcome; he has an orchestra of splendid history, of brilliant qualities, of great possibilities, at his command. He will find a people making up his audiences eager for the best that he and his men can give and expecting the best because they feel that the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for the best in music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Herald
DEC 1 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

New Music at the Boston Symphony Matinee and Elsewhere; Week-End Diversions

Mr. Koussevitzky put on his Saturday program, among other pieces, a work composed in 1914 and a work composed in 1884-'85. Most of the younger work had aged incredibly, but the older, which predated it by a generation, seemed lustier and more virile than ever—a thing superbly contemptuous of the passing of the years. This phenomenon, of course—this divine agelessness of the greatest art—is a familiar thing, and its profound mysteriousness and inexplicable wonder come upon us with renewed conviction only when they are set off against the pathetic mortality of those lesser works which, contemporaneous in quality as they may seem at their emergence, begin to die as soon as they are born.

* * *

The music of our own time to which we listened at Saturday's concert, and to which we owe these apparently melancholy but really heartening observations, was Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." This work by the Russian ultra-modernist was composed in the first year of the war, and was produced in 1916 at Petrograd.

It is a pity that we have had to wait so long before knowing it; for, except for a few remarkable pages of the suite to which we shall refer later, this music has faded deplorably. We ourselves heard Mr. Koussevitzky play it in Paris in the spring of 1923, and it then sounded fresh, audacious, exhilaratingly original. We are now a year and a half older than we were then; but the "Scythian Suite" sounded to us on Saturday at least twenty years older than it did on that May evening at Koussevitzky's concert in the Paris Opera House. Pages that at first hearing had seemed daringly imaginative, splendidly wild and barbaric, as befitted a musical transcript of the life and times of that ancient race of savages who dwelt along the north shore of the Black Sea, sounded yesterday tame and conventional.

* * *

We have said above that there is a most important qualification to be made in discussing the "Scythian Suite." It should really be viewed as two separate compositions. Three-quarters of it (the first, second and third movements) are the work of an exceedingly clever young man of talent, whose audacities have now become the mere amenities of contemporary musical intercourse. But one-quarter of it—the fourth and last movement—is the work of a youngster of astonishing genius. This finale of the "Scythian Suite," in which Prokofieff essays to portray "The Glorious Departure of the hero Lolly and the Procession of the Sun," is an evocation of a pagan sunrise—the miracle of dawn seen through the savagely ecstatic eyes and frenzied brains of sun-worshiping barbarians. It swept us off our feet when we first heard it a year and a half ago, and Saturday it took us captive again by its imaginative power and its blazing magnificence as music. Those piercing, exultant, hieratical trumpets, that cumulative radiance of the whole orchestra as the wild men chant their hymn to the dazzling god and the world takes fire, are like nothing else in the literature of music. If Prokofieff could only suppress the first ninety-seven pages of the "Scythian Suite," and use the last ten as the basis of a single elaborated tone-picture, we should have a masterpiece.

* * *

We turned from the tissue of faded though once vivid modernisms that constitute the bulk of Prokofieff's suite—all but the gorgeous finale—to that great work which followed it on Mr. Koussevitzky's program, but anticipated it in musical history by so many years, the E minor symphony of Brahms. It is forty years old (or will be next summer, to be exact), yet never before has it seemed to us so full of sap and energy, so overbrimming with strong and passionate beauty, so splendidly alive. Yet this is the music that was once called sour and ascetic and grim, which was so long in reaching the heart of the Viennese. It has been said by Brahms's biographers that this symphony "pictures the tragedy of human life;" that Brahms, reading the tragedies of Sophocles while he composed it, transferred their somberness to his music.

If this is so, then Sophocles underwent a sea change in the process. The E Minor Symphony has, to be sure, something of the occasional gravity, the soberly compassionate melancholy that is inseparable from the meditations of all mature minds who are aware of the essentially tragic quality of human existence. But dejection is scarcely its characteristic note.

* * *

It had been rumored that Mr. Koussevitzky was disposed to "Russianize" this symphony, and many a devoted Brahmsian breast was agitated in advance over the prospective Scriabinization of the cherished work. But Mr. Koussevitzky did nothing of the sort. He gave the symphony a reading which can fairly be called a "sane" one. That adjective is occasionally a synonym for "dull." It was not so in this case. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance was not only conservative, it was warmly emotional, and in the great Finale it was eloquent and full-throated, as well as imposingly architectural. We were disappointed in his first movement. We missed here the essential Brahmsian robustness, the sweep and energy and vitality. But the dark loveliness of the Andante, the enchanting sportiveness of the Scherzo, and, above all, the cumulative grandeur of the Finale, were reflected in the performance.

It was by no means a transcendent performance. There was overblowing of the brass in the earlier part of the first movement; in the statement of the theme at the beginning of the Finale the inner voices of the harmony protruded like sore thumbs; and some of the tempi were heavy-footed. But in general the reading was matured and sensitive and communicative.

* * *

In the Russian music that he played—Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina," Glinka's overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," and a one-minute excerpt from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan," called "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"—Mr. Koussevitzky was at his best. He repeated the pretty scherzo from Rimsky's opera, as he had done in Boston a few weeks before. He might better have repeated his superb performance of the last movement of Prokofieff's suite, which would have served a useful purpose. For if any works on a symphony program are to be repeated, surely they should be those that are novel in content—provided they are not too long.

There was an audience that packed the house, and Mr. Koussevitzky was rapturously applauded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 2 1924

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Koussevitzky Ill With Severe Cold

Serge Koussevitzky is suffering from a hard cold caught in New York, so Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, conducted the first of the five extra Monday evening Symphony concerts, last night.

The soloist, Dusolina Giannini, who sang for the first time in Boston, proved the most admirable new singer heard here in many years. Wary reviewers whose swans in the past have sometimes turned out to be geese usually avoid prophecies, yet one ventures the assertion that Miss Giannini will be numbered among the two or three greatest singers of her generation. She has a marvellous voice, and, what is more remarkable, she uses it like a great musician.

Mr Koussevitzky's illness is not regarded as serious. He felt ill during the Saturday concert in New York, so delayed his return to Boston until Sunday night. Yesterday morning he hoped to take the rehearsal for last night's concert, but was unable to do so. Up until 5 in the afternoon he expected to conduct last night, but his physician advised against it. Unless unexpected complications develop, Koussevitsky will conduct the regular concerts this week Friday and Saturday.

Last night's audience was, of course, greatly disappointed at not hearing Koussevitzky. Mr Burgin's capable conducting and the competent response to it by the orchestra made some amends. It would be unfair to judge Mr Burgin as a conductor under the circumstances. He naturally carried through Koussevitzky's interpretations of the music on the program, all of it recently played more than once under Koussevitzky. There was evidence, especially in Beethoven's C minor Symphony, that Mr Burgin would prove a conductor with individuality and energy if heard when he had had the usual time for rehearsal and preparation.

Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific, 231," made an even deeper impression than at the first Boston performance last October. It is no more "stunt," but finely wrought music with plenty of emotional intensity. The composer has not tried to picture an actual locomotive, he has written a rhapsody.

Dusalina Giannini was born in Philadelhpia of Italian parents less than 25 years ago. She has studied with Mme Sembrich. New York and London reviewers have praised her in the highest terms. She is now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Her voice is as beautiful as any since Melba. It has warmth and resonance, yet perfect clarity and purity of quality. At climaxes there is a thrilling volume of tone, but Miss Giannini knows better than to overwork her voice.

She chose for her Boston debut one of the most difficult airs in the entire concert repertory, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon." She not only sang it with ease and authority of style, she felt and rendered the tumult of conflicting emotions in the heroine's breast in the opera. Miss Giannini is to be heard here as soloist with the Harvard Glee Club in February.

P. R.

KOUSSEVITZKY ILL IN JAMAICA PLAIN HOME

Caught Cold on New York Trip—Hopes to Be Out Soon

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was prevented by slight illness from conducting the performance of that organization at Symphony hall last night. He contracted a cold on the first trip of the season of the orchestra to New York last week and now has an inflamed throat. According to Mme. Koussevitzky, speaking from the home at 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, the conductor's physician ordered him to stay in the house for a day or two. He will conduct the performances on Thursday and Friday of this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 3 1924

Koussevitzky Arrives

(From the N. Y. World)

The consensus seems to be that Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is as great as he had been declared to be. For this we may be thankful. The leadership of the Boston orchestra, or any of our great orchestras, is in many ways more important than the presidency of one of our universities. Too often we have seen great orchestras fall into the hands of some absurd little fellow more fit for matinee acting than interpretation of music. The new conductor was evidently at some pains to correct an impression that he was sensational, and in this he was wise, if he has ever had a leaning in that direction. The American public has acquired a keen eye for the musical grandstander, and theatricality is no longer a virtue. The Boston orchestra has suffered lamentable vicissitudes since the departure of Muck, although Monteux did heroic service toward rebuilding it. If the new conductor can pick up the reins where Monteux left off and attain to still higher ground he will have done us an inestimable service.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Changed Programs

SINCE Mr. Koussevitzky's illness has shortened the time for rehearsals, the programs for the pending Symphony Concerts in Boston and Cambridge this week have been modified accordingly. At Sanders Theater on Thursday evening the orchestra will be heard in the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger"; Mozart's Symphony in G minor; Honegger's "locomotive-piece"; Sibelius's tone-poems, "Finlandia" and "The Swan of Tuonela"; Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." For the concerts at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the program now stands:

Prelude to the Opera, "Penelope".....Fauré
Elegy for Violoncello and Orchestra.....Fauré
Suite, No. 1 from "Daphnis and Chloe" ..Ravel
Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven

It is expected that Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct at the concerts in Boston. In Cambridge he will not conduct. Mr. Burgi will be substitute.

anches 3
Dec 10

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
DEC 4 1924

PROPER PRECAUTION: CENTURIES SPANNED: STUDENT ORCHESTRA

EMERGENCY, CONSEQUENCES AND A LESSON

The Need of an Assistant-Conductor for the Symphony Concerts—Old Music to New Pleasure — Mr. Martino's Eighteenth-Century Pieces — The Harvard Orchestra Not Too Evenly

FORTUNATELY, Mr. Koussevitzky has thrown off the illness that, for a day or two, threatened to disable him. If he conducts at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, as he now expects to do, he will have missed only two concerts in the schedule of the Symphony Orchestra—one in Boston last Monday, one in Cambridge this evening. Even so, his brief sickness was enough to throw out of running gear a delicate and often overloaded machine. There was no assistant-conductor to lead in Mr. Koussevitzky's stead. Therefore Mr. Burgin, next in rank, as concert-master, in the orchestral hierarchy, went through the motions last Monday at Symphony Hall, as he will this evening—with more freedom and confidence—in Sanders Theater. To accord with the change in conductors, the program for the concert in Cambridge was materially altered. Since Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to hold the usual rehearsals, the program for the concerts in Boston also underwent revision; while into the future receded pieces that the conductor had in mind for immediate performance—Ravel's orchestral version of "Alborada del Gracioso"; Skriabin's "Divine Poem"; Stravinsky's long anticipated "Song of the Nightingale."

Had Mr. Koussevitzky been disabled for a week, a fortnight, a month, the whole scheme and the whole schedule of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, at home and abroad, would have been thrown into dire confusion. Moreover, it is not the music as music or the orchestra as orchestra that now sells every seat on every occasion in every city. It is the presence, the renown, the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, in play upon the imagination of the public. He is not rugged of body—and the climate of New England and New York in winter and spring is hard to bear. He has not the tranquil temperament that carried Mr. Monteux through five years of concerts—not one missed. The peculiar virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky is his ceaseless nervous energy. To release it over a schedule of a hundred-odd concerts is to be ever on the verge of overwork.

In these circumstances, the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra might reasonably and immediately consider the development or the engagement of an assistant-conductor. Whether there are men of promise as such within the ranks of the band, an outsider may not easily say. In Dr. Muck's time it contained a serviceable substitute not ill received. Possibly a passable remplaçant now sits under Mr. Koussevitzky. Certainly by the evidence of Monday, he is not Mr. Richard Burgin, able concert-master though the violinist be. If the orchestra yields no promising aspirant, then an assistant-conductor should be sought elsewhere. There are young Americans ambitious of such a job for entrance to a career, who would profit much by work under Mr. Koussevitzky. There are young or middle-aged Europeans who would cut a caper at the opportunity. No doubt Mr Koussevitzky himself would have suggestions, even choices. It would, indeed, be his right to choose. True, an assistant-conductor would add another salary to the treasury; but that salary would be only additional price paid for Mr. Koussevitzky—and security. It is the custom to say that he and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, for the while, inseparable. If so, then an assistant-conductor is the means wherewith to seal the bond. H. T. P.

of Saggione, rippling and bright-textured after three hundred years. Forthwith and wisely Mr. Martini passed to stouter-bodied, ampler-throated, warmer-blooded composers. Again a Concerto Grosso of Corelli gained that striding counterpoint, that breadth of phrase and period, that stringy resonance, that zest of progress and creation which are the passion and the power of much eighteenth-century music, be the composer major or minor. Piquant to hear was Tartini, mating and parting his singing violins and piping flutes through a "Pastoral Suite." Discovery, indeed, was a certain J. Neubauer, dateless somewhere in the seventeenth century, who could shape a Suite of Dances in clean, full contours; sustain and vary rhythms; court in those early days an audible richness of harmony and sonority of voice. There were forerunners of Bach say the history-books.

So was Mr. Martino fortunate in his choice of numbers, avoiding the merely archaic, harping not too much upon charm and quaintness, preferring vigor to elegance wherever it was to be had, neither surfeiting nor starving an audience to other musics accustomed. He bettered also the playing of the pieces; remembering Mr. Koussevitky's breadths and warmths, curving line more flexibly, heeding euphonies more sensitively. His orchestra, too, gave him back a more transparent, crisp and resilient tone. Less fortunate were conductor and audience in the assisting singers. With the best will in the world, Miss Doris Emerson sang two airs from "Figaro's Wedding"; but the manifold and artful Mozart is not for her monotonous and relatively artless song. The luscious periods of Handel evaded her dry tones; but she came nearer to the simpler, fresher graces of Purcell. Of course, Mr. Fornari was at ease and humorsome in two patter-airs out of a homely opera by Galuppi; but his tones are as flavorless musically as they were in his days in the theater. Next time, moreover, Mr. Martino should enlarge his wind-choir. Only flutes last evening diversified the too persistent strings. H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE INDIANAPOLIS
IND.
TIMES
DEC 5 1924

In New York

By JAMES W. DEAN

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelberg, Van Hoogstraten, Bodanzky, Furtwangler and Stransky, the composer, with Philharmonic, and Damrosch and Vladimir Golschmann with the Symphony Society. Koussevitsky

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From Telegram DEC 5 1924
New York City

The Orchestras.

Walter Damrosch devoted yesterday afternoon's New York Symphony program at Carnegie Hall to Wagner and Moussorgsky, beginning with the scherzo of the symphony in C major which Wagner wrote in 1832. One might assume that conductors, weary of the sempiternal round of Wagnerian concert fragments, would occasionally find an excuse for bringing forward this youthful work which, if not the Wagner of "Lohengrin" or "Tristan," is still healthy and interesting music, showing what a vigorous grasp of instrumentation and symphonic form the composer had gained by nineteen. But since Mr. Damrosch played the entire symphony thirteen years ago no one had bothered about it.

Listening yesterday to this fresh, if Beethovenian page, one regretted that the conductor had not found it expedient to perform the remaining movements (or, at least, the andante—best of the four) even at the temporary cost of the "Good Friday Spell" and the "Meistersinger" overture. Certainly the symphony would inject an agreeable variety into Wagnerian programs hereabouts, as would also the "Columbus" and "Rule Britannia" overtures, or even the despised "Centennial March."

Mischa Mischakoff contributed a performance rich in sentimental palpitations of the "Good Friday" music, transformed into a kind of violin concerto. Mr. Damrosch has often played this questionable version to make a concertmaster's holiday. A more profitable feature was the tasteful and intelligent delivery of Sachs' second act monologue by that excellent artist, Fraser Gange. Mr. Gange was likewise occupied in the Moussorgsky novelty of the occasion. It is a spirited and ingeniously humorous parody upon certain contemporaries of the composer called "The Peep Show." Stassow suggested the idea of the caricature which Moussorgsky carried out to the delight of his intimates.

Written for barytone and piano (Sir Henry Wood attended to the present orchestration) Moussorgsky made merry over individuals in his path more literally and with greater freedom of travesty than Elgar in his "Enigma." There is no enigma in the way the composer of "Boris" holds the mirror up to the pedantic head of the Petersburg Conservatory to the sounds of "See the Conquering Hero Comes," to "Fiff"—Theophile—Tolstoi, who gushed over Adelina Patti in a kind of pseudo, "Se Saran Rose"; to the Teutonized composer Serov, who is smitten on his entrance with a theme of his own, or to the Grand Duchess Helena Pavlovna, who is the subject of a thunderous invocation. It is all capital fooling, though brevity is not the soul of its wit.

The concert ended with the "Pictures from an Exhibition," scored by one Leonidas Leonardi. Mr. Koussevitzky is also going to exhibit these pictures, though scored by Ravel. Whoever the scorer, some of us will continue to prefer them in their original piano vesture.

The evening's Philharmonic concert in the same hall offered a program containing Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Beethoven's violin concerto played by Concertmaster Scipione Guidi, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Tristan" prelude and "Love-Death." Mr. Van Hoogstraten's performance of the austerely splendid overture of Brahms commended itself by the keenness of its rhythmic outlines. And the conductor may be duly thanked for taking thought of Charles Martin Loeffler. "La Bonne Chanson" is over twenty years old. It falls short of the "Pagan Poem" and in some ways even of its companion piece, "La Villanelle du Diable." Yet time has not sapped its delicate flavor.

Mr. Guidi's performance of the concerto appealed by its straightforward and musicianly qualities. H. F. P.

Jewish Tribune
Dec. 5
of New York.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The New York debut of Serge Koussevitzky, at the head of the famous Boston Orchestra, proved the most interesting event of the new music season.

The new conductor has a prepossessing appearance—a mobile face, and that indefinable quality, generally known as personality.

Mr. Kussevitzky chose for his program a Vivaldi Concerto for organ, arranged by Siloti, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's two familiar nocturnes, (Nuages and Fetes) Honnegger's "Pacific 231" and as the piece de resistance, Scriabin's "Poem de l'Extase."

The Saturday afternoon concert embraced Glinka's delightful "Ruslan and Ludmilla" overture, Moussorgsky's overture to "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," (repeated, a rare occurrence at a Boston concert) Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" (first time in New York), and as a balm to the classicists — Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

The Vivaldi Concerto served to show the ingratiating qualities of Orchestra and conductor. The timbre of each of the string sections was brought out with distinctness and delicacy, and the slow movement in particular was played with extraordinary finesse. The opening horn-solo in the "Oberon" Overture was admirably restrained, perhaps too much so for the size of the hall. Honnegger's locomotive had an expert engineer to guide it, and the ecstasies of Scriabin were never proclaimed as thrillingly as on this occasion.

Mr. Kussevitsky was generous, if somewhat novel, in his first New York programs. There was indeed more novelty compressed into these two concerts, than one is accustomed to hear in the course of a season, by some of our more conservative orchestras. The climax of the Saturday afternoon concert was the stupendous playing of the Prokofieff Suite. This is barbarous music, uneven, but of unmistakable genius!

Brahms's Fourth Symphony showed Mr. Kussevitsky in a more sober mood. There was color as well as animation in the playing of the Symphony, without a hint of forced or exaggerated effects.

The seven lean years of the Boston Symphony are over! A true leader has come, and he has come to stay!

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
DEC 5 1924

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Carrying On

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S illness again preventing him from appearing on the conductor's stand of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Burgin substituted at the concert last evening in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. Only the Mozart G minor Symphony (K. 550) of the original program remained, and in place of Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, and the Scythian Suite of Prokoviev, stood Wagner, Honegger, Sibelius, and Chaikovsky. Substituting in like-fashion last Monday, Mr. Burgin in his conducting followed close on the heels of Mr. Koussevitzky with apparently dubious results. Not so last evening. Independent, determining his own reading, he performed creditably, even notably, and on many occasions produced a more straightforward and foursquare interpretation of measure on measure than Mr. Koussevitzky's. While the latter is laying so carefully and with such attention the blocks in his marvellous rhythmic structure, guarding his tempo with a jealous eye, the more delicate tones—not the tonal masses—are often dimmed or partly obscured. Should Mr. Burgin seek rashly to solve the Koussevitzky enigma, disaster would be imminent; it is not his way, as concert-master, soloist, chamber-musician or conductor. What temptation there must have been to tackle Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" in the manner of the Russian leader, Wagner as the great blazing sunburst! But temptation was done with, and Mr. Burgin took his Wagner in his own way, nor laid lamina upon lamina of brass, nor sharpened great peaks in his rhythm. Beating a regular, moderate (sometimes monotonous) course, he sought for tone individually rather than massed, and for symmetry and balance more than accentuation and sudden effect. In such respects he was close to Mr. Monteux and the even-tempered conductor. Wagner sang, it did not thunder; it shone, never glittered or flashed.

That over (and reason for gratification in a crowded Sanders, early-filled), a new curiosity awakened with respect to Mozart. Here again Mr. Burgin, more confident and surer of himself, followed his own ideas. From the beginning his tempo was a bit fast, lending a whimsical air to passages of deeper intent; but his ear was still for symmetry and his vision broad. No warped or strangled Mozart this, but open, free, with the spirit of largesse upon it. Was not the melody of the Allegro extraordinarily sharp and clear, was not the quiet and pacific character of the Andante preserved, were not flute and woodwinds of the Minuetto-Trio warm and breathless in delight? By ranging his instruments with more equality in values than a virtuoso would accord them, Mr. Burgin's Mozart—and indeed his other pieces as well—filled with what appeared new interest. The very relief from marked and intended accents implied others.

Honegger's "Pacific 231," the locomotive in music, which has earlier been greeted with mingled enjoyment and disgust, aroused palpable enthusiasm, or at least curiosity, in its initial and early sounds. The cheerful conception of a vast, panting boiler with all its associated mechanical noises resolves into an original pattern, rich in vibrant on the strings and double basses. But thereafter, the great mogul finally accelerated to a judicious speed, the composition loses for a space its power as program music, nor can it fall back in turn on the beauty of its substance, for there is very little of it. First of all, did not M. Honegger, lover of engines as we believe him to be, miss a trick when his Pacific snorts out of the station? All good locomotives in the act of getting under weigh spin their driving wheels: signal for a flutter on the strings. Second, during that head-long imaginary journey the tempo should certainly not waver. The music (sic) periodically wears itself out, leaping forward in fine frenzy of cacophonous joy. A great grinding of brakes, relentless decrescendo, and the piece is halted. All rather interesting but not the last word. Somebody some day will transcribe the airplane or merriment of the roller-coaster into notes and bars more respectable than this; but Mr. Koussevitzky's dynamic power can do more for Honegger's rhythm than can his understudy.

Sibelius and Chalkovsky, new matter for Mr. Burgin, found him in sympathetic mood. The former's "Finlandia," perhaps a it, tedious at first, quickened and expanded under his direction. Harmonies abound in it, and its energy grows with the pages. More lovely in detached and simple wonder, Sibelius's "The Swan of Tounela," filled the air with melodies caught in Elysian fields or under the spell of pipers long familiar to the Arabian Nights. Mr. Speyer, in a scattering of notes, made the oboe plaintive or impassioned. He was repeatedly applauded. Chaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," sonorous, frenzied, or deathly still, cannot lose the appearance of turning Shakespeare's tragedy inside out. Mr. Burgin sought for the dramatic quality but did not achieve the towering height nor the sublimity of depth which is there. Brass and percussion, eager and calcitrant, venture early into the music, taking with the love theme the gradual steps to tragedy and that final flare of notes which is the winding-sheet of tragedy. D. McC.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 4 1924

PROPER PRECAUTION: CENTURIES SPANNED: STUDENT ORCHESTRA

EMERGENCY, CONSEQUENCES AND A LESSON

The Need of an Assistant-Conductor for the Symphony Concerts—Old Music to New Pleasure — Mr. Martino's Eighteenth-Century Pieces — The Harvard Orchestra Not Too Evenly

FORTUNATELY, Mr. Koussevitzky has thrown off the illness that, for a day or two, threatened to disable him. If he conducts at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, as he now expects to do, he will have missed only two concerts in the schedule of the Symphony Orchestra—one in Boston last Monday, one in Cambridge this evening. Even so, his brief sickness was enough to throw out of running gear a delicate and often overloaded machine. There was no assistant-conductor to lead in Mr. Koussevitzky's stead. Therefore Mr. Burgin, next in rank, as concert-master, in the orchestral hierarchy, went through the motions last Monday at Symphony Hall, as he will this evening—with more freedom and confidence—in Sanders Theater. To accord with the change in conductors, the program for the concert in Cambridge was materially altered. Since Mr. Koussevitzky was unable to hold the usual rehearsals, the program for the concerts in Boston also underwent revision; while into the future receded pieces that the conductor had in mind for immediate performance—Ravel's orchestral version of "Alborada del Gracioso"; Skriabin's "Divine Poem"; Stravinsky's long anticipated "Song of the Nightingale."

Had Mr. Koussevitzky been disabled for a week, a fortnight, a month, the whole scheme and the whole schedule of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, at home and abroad, would have been thrown into dire confusion. Moreover, it is not the music as music or the orchestra as orchestra that now sells every seat on every occasion in every city. It is the presence, the renown, the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, in play upon the imagination of the public. He is not rugged of body—and the climate of New England and New York in winter and spring is hard to bear. He has not the tranquil temperament that carried Mr. Monteux through five years of concerts—not one missed. The peculiar virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky is his ceaseless nervous energy. To release it over a schedule of a hundred-odd concerts is to be ever on the verge of overwork.

In these circumstances, the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra might reasonably and immediately consider the development or the engagement of an assistant-conductor. Whether there are men of promise as such within the ranks of the band, an outsider may not easily say. In Dr. Muck's time it contained a serviceable substitute not ill received. Possibly a passable remplaçant now sits under Mr. Koussevitzky. Certainly by the evidence of Monday, he is not Mr. Richard Burgin, able concert-master though the violinist be. If the orchestra yields no promising aspirant, then an assistant-conductor should be sought elsewhere. There are young Americans ambitious of such a job for entrance to a career, who would profit much by work under Mr. Koussevitzky. There are young or middle-aged Europeans who would cut a caper at the opportunity. No doubt Mr Koussevitzky himself would have suggestions, even choices. It would, indeed, be his right to choose. True, an assistant-conductor would add another salary to the treasury; but that salary would be only additional price paid for Mr. Koussevitzky—and security. It is the custom to say that he and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, for the while, inseparable. If so, then an assistant-conductor is the means wherewith to seal the bond. H. T. P.

of Saggione, rippling and bright-textured after three hundred years. Forthwith and wisely Mr. Martini passed to stouter-bodied, ampler-throated, warmer-blooded composers. Again a Concerto Grosso of Corelli gained that striding counterpoint, that breadth of phrase and period, that stringy resonance, that zest of progress and creation which are the passion and the power of much eighteenth-century music, be the composer major or minor. Piquant to hear was Tartini, mating and parting his singing violins and piping flutes through a "Pastoral Suite." Discovery, indeed, was a certain J. Neubauer, dateless somewhere in the seventeenth century, who could shape a Suite of Dances in clean, full contours; sustain and vary rhythms; court in those early days an audible richness of harmony and sonority of voice. There were forerunners of Bach say the history-books.

So was Mr. Martino fortunate in his choice of numbers, avoiding the merely archaic, harping not too much upon charm and quaintness, preferring vigor to elegance wherever it was to be had, neither surfeiting nor starving an audience to other musics accustomed. He bettered also the playing of the pieces; remembering Mr. Koussevitky's breadths and warmths, curving line more flexibly, heeding euphonies more sensitively. His orchestra, too, gave him back a more transparent, crisp and resilient tone. Less fortunate were conductor and audience in the assisting singers. With the best will in the world, Miss Doris Emerson sang two airs from "Figaro's Wedding"; but the manifold and artful Mozart is not for her monotonous and relatively artless song. The luscious periods of Handel evaded her dry tones; but she came nearer to the simpler, fresher graces of Purcell. Of course, Mr. Fornari was at ease and humorsome in two patter-airs out of a homely opera by Galuppi; but his tones are as flavorless musically as they were in his days in the theater. Next time, moreover, Mr. Martino should enlarge his wind-choir. Only flutes last evening diversified the too persistent strings. H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE INDIANAPOLIS
IND.
TIMES
DEC 5 1924

In New York

By JAMES W. DEAN

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky. And may the better pair of spats

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From DEC 5 1924
Telegram
New York City

The Orchestras.

Walter Damrosch devoted yesterday afternoon's New York Symphony program at Carnegie Hall to Wagner and Moussorgsky, beginning with the scherzo of the symphony in C major which Wagner wrote in 1832. One might assume that conductors, weary of the sempiternal round of Wagnerian concert fragments, would occasionally find an excuse for bringing forward this youthful work which, if not the Wagner of "Lohengrin" or "Tristan," is still healthy and interesting music, showing what a vigorous grasp of instrumentation and symphonic form the composer had gained by nineteen. But since Mr. Damrosch played the entire symphony thirteen years ago no one had bothered about it.

Listening yesterday to this fresh, if Beethovenian page, one regretted that the conductor had not found it expedient to perform the remaining movements (or, at least, the andante—best of the four) even at the temporary cost of the "Good Friday Spell" and the "Meistersinger" overture. Certainly the symphony would inject an agreeable variety into Wagnerian programs hereabouts, as would also the "Columbus" and "Rule Britannia" overtures, or even the despised "Centennial March."

Mischa Mischakoff contributed a performance rich in sentimental palpitations of the "Good Friday" music, transformed into a kind of violin concerto. Mr. Damrosch has often played this questionable version to make a concertmaster's holiday. A more profitable feature was the tasteful and intelligent delivery of Sachs' second act monologue by that excellent artist, Fraser Gange. Mr. Gange was likewise occupied in the Moussorgsky novelty of the occasion. It is a spirited and ingeniously humorous parody upon certain contemporaries of the composer called "The Peep Show." Stassow suggested the idea of the caricature which Moussorgsky carried out to the delight of his intimates.

Written for barytone and piano (Sir Henry Wood attended to the present orchestration) Moussorgsky made merry over individuals in his path more literally and with greater freedom of travesty than Elgar in his "Enigma." There is no enigma in the way the composer of "Boris" holds the mirror up to the pedantic head of the Petersburg Conservatory to the sounds of "See the Conquering Hero Comes," to "Fiff"—Theophile—Tolstoi, who gushed over Adelina Patti in a kind of pseudo, "Se Saran Rose"; to the Teutonized composer Serov, who is smitten on his entrance with a theme of his own, or to the Grand Duchess Helena Pavlovna, who is the subject of a thunderous invocation. It is all capital fooling, though brevity is not the soul of its wit.

The concert ended with the "Pictures from an Exhibition," scored by one Leonidas Leonardi. Mr. Koussevitzky is also going to exhibit these pictures, though scored by Ravel. Whoever the scorer, some of us will continue to prefer them in their original piano vesture.

The evening's Philharmonic concert in the same hall offered a program containing Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Beethoven's violin concerto played by Concertmaster Scipione Guidi, Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Tristan" prelude and "Love-Death." Mr. Van Hoogstraaten's performance of the austerely splendid overture of Brahms commended itself by the keenness of its rhythmic outlines. And the conductor may be duly thanked for taking thought of Charles Martin Loeffler. "La Bonne Chanson" is over twenty years old. It falls short of the "Pagan Poem" and in some ways even of its companion piece, "La Villanelle du Diable." Yet time has not sapped its delicate flavor.

Mr. Guidi's performance of the concerto appealed by its straightforward and musicianly qualities. H. F. P.

of New York.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The New York debut of Serge Koussevitzky, at the head of the famous Boston Orchestra, proved the most interesting event of the new music season.

The new conductor has a prepossessing appearance—a mobile face, and that indefinable quality, generally known as personality.

Mr. Kussevitzky chose for his program a Vivaldi Concerto for organ, arranged by Siloti, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Debussy's two familiar nocturnes, (Nuages and Fetes) Honnegger's "Pacific 231" and as the piece de resistance, Scriabin's "Poem de l'Extase."

The Saturday afternoon concert embraced Glinka's delightful "Ruslan and Ludmilla" overture, Moussorgsky's overture to "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," (repeated, a rare occurrence at a Boston concert) Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" (first time in New York), and as a balm to the classicists — Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

The Vivaldi Concerto served to show the ingratiating qualities of Orchestra and conductor. The timbre of each of the string sections was brought out with distinctness and delicacy, and the slow movement in particular was played with extraordinary finesse. The opening horn-solo in the "Oberon" Overture was admirably restrained, perhaps too much so for the size of the hall. Honnegger's locomotive had an expert engineer to guide it, and the ecstasies of Scriabin were never proclaimed as thrillingly as on this occasion.

Mr. Kussevitsky was generous, if somewhat novel, in his first New York programs. There was indeed more novelty compressed into these two concerts, than one is accustomed to hear in the course of a season, by some of our more conservative orchestras. The climax of the Saturday afternoon concert was the stupendous playing of the Prokofieff Suite. This is barbarous music, uneven, but of unmistakable genius!

Brahms's Fourth Symphony showed Mr. Kussevitsky in a more sober mood. There was color as well as animation in the playing of the Symphony, without a hint of forced or exaggerated effects.

The seven lean years of the Boston Symphony are over! A true leader has come, and he has come to stay!

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 5 1924

215

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Carrying On

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S illness again preventing him from appearing on the conductor's stand of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Burgin substituted at the concert last evening in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. Only the Mozart G minor Symphony (K. 550) of the original program remained, and in place of Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov, and the Scythian Suite of Prokoviev, stood Wagner, Honegger, Sibelius, and Chaikovsky. Substituting in like-fashion last Monday, Mr. Burgin in his conducting followed close on the heels of Mr. Koussevitzky with apparently dubious results. Not so last evening. Independent, determining his own reading, he performed creditably, even notably, and on many occasions produced a more straightforward and foursquare interpretation of measure on measure than Mr. Koussevitzky's. While the latter is laying so carefully and with such attention the blocks in his marvellous rhythmic structure, guarding his tempo with a jealous eye, the more delicate tones—not the tonal masses—are often dimmed or partly obscured. Should Mr. Burgin seek rashly to solve the Koussevitzky enigma, disaster would be imminent; it is not his way, as concert-master, soloist, chamber-musician or conductor. What temptation there must have been to tackle Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" in the manner of the Russian leader, Wagner as the great blazing sunburst! But temptation was done with, and Mr. Burgin took his Wagner in his own way, nor laid lamina upon lamina of brass, nor sharpened great peaks in his rhythm. Beating a regular, moderate (sometimes monotonous) course, he sought for tone individually rather than massed, and for symmetry and balance more than accentuation and sudden effect. In such respects he was close to Mr. Monteux and the even-tempered conductor. Wagner sang, it did not thunder; it shone, never glittered or flashed.

That over (and reason for gratification in a crowded Sanders, early-filled), a new curiosity awakened with respect to Mozart. Here again Mr. Burgin, more confident and surer of himself, followed his own ideas. From the beginning his tempo was a bit fast, lending a whimsical air to passages of deeper intent; but his ear was still for symmetry and his vision broad. No warped or strangled Mozart this, but open, free, with the spirit of largesse upon it. Was not the melody of the Allegro extraordinarily sharp and clear, was not the quiet and pacific character of the Andante preserved, were not flute and woodwinds of the Minuetto-Trio warm and breathless in delight? By ranging his instruments with more equality in values than a virtuoso would accord them, Mr. Burgin's Mozart—and indeed his other pieces as well—filled with what appeared new interest. The very relief from marked and intended accents implied others.

Honegger's "Pacific 231," the locomotive in music, which has earlier been greeted with mingled enjoyment and disgust, aroused palpable enthusiasm, or at least curiosity, in its initial and early sounds. The cheerful conception of a vast, panting boiler with all its associated mechanical noises resolves into an original pattern, rich in vibrant on the strings and double basses. But thereafter, the great mogul finally accelerated to a judicious speed, the composition loses for a space its power as program music, nor can it fall back in turn on the beauty of its substance, for there is very little of it. First of all, did not M. Honegger, lover of engines as we believe him to be, miss a trick when his Pacific snorts out of the station? All good locomotives in the act of getting under weigh spin their driving wheels: signal for a flutter on the strings. Second, during that head-long imaginary journey the tempo should certainly not waver. The music (sic) periodically wears itself out, leaping forward in fine frenzy of cacophonous joy. A great grinding of brakes, relentless decrescendo, and the piece is halted. All rather interesting but not the last word. Somebody some day will transcribe the airplane or merriment of the roller-coaster into notes and bars more respectable than this; but Mr. Koussevitzky's dynamic power can do more for Honegger's rhythm than can his understudy.

Sibelius and Chaikovsky, new matter for Mr. Burgin, found him in sympathetic mood. The former's "Finlandia," perhaps a it, tedious at first, quickened and expanded under his direction. Harmonies abound in it, and its energy grows with the pages. More lovely in detached and simple wonder, Sibelius's "The Swan of Tounela," filled the air with melodies caught in Elysian fields or under the spell of pipers long familiar to the Arabian Nights. Mr. Speyer, in a scattering of notes, made the oboe plaintive or impassioned. He was repeatedly applauded. Chaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," sonorus, frenzied, or deathly still, cannot lose the appearance of turning Shakespeare's tragedy inside out. Mr. Burgin sought for the dramatic quality but did not achieve the towering height nor the sublimity of depth which is there. Brass and percussion, eager and calcitrant, venture early into the music, taking with the love theme the gradual steps to tragedy and that final flare of notes which is the winding-sheet of tragedy. D. McC.

216

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 5 1924

MUSIC OF THE DAY

DURING the late summer, before orchestras emerged from seclusion for the rigors of the season, it was bruited about that Mr. Koussewitsky, when he visited New York with the Boston Symphony, would present the Ravel orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures from an Exposition." Perhaps the truth of this rumor will yet be demonstrated, but in the meantime Walter Damrosch has stolen a little march on his Russian confrere and has given us Moussorgsky's pieces in an arrangement by Leonidas Leonardi.

The premiere took place at yesterday's matinee of the Symphony Society. The rare delicacy which Mr. Damrosch exercises in his relations with other conductors was never more strikingly evident. For surely he could only have played this suite in order to prepare us for the Ravel arrangement, which by comparison is an original masterpiece. Leonardi's hand is heavy, and his sense of orchestral timbre not particularly acute. One felt that he used a great many instruments to produce a very small effect. There was much noise, but no play of color, neither contrast nor charm.

Moussorgsky's music itself is delightful. The suite of ten pieces (Mr. Damrosch, in a moment of contrition, omitted three) was composed at the inspiration of pictures by the architect V. Hartmann, a friend of Moussorgsky. There is little in them reminiscent of the profundity of "Boris" or the analytical feeling so apparent in the songs, but there is a great deal more than a mere cleverness with notes. "The Musician Peep Show," a long song with orchestral accompaniment, was sung by Fraser Gange. Like most great artists, Moussorgsky had a lighter side, and in this piece he parodied the critics of his day. It is witty, sharp, but it is, after all, a joke. Mr. Gange acquitted himself well—the drolleries of the Peep Show were more within his limits than Hans Sach's monologue from the second act of "Meistersinger," which Mr. Damrosch included on the first half of his program.

The Scherzo from the C major Symphony, the "Meistersinger" Overture, the March of the Knights and the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" completed the program. The Good Friday music was arranged as a violin solo, played by Mischa Mishakoff, concert meister of the orchestra. Mr. Damrosch, in his Wagner, was uniformly uninspiring. The Overture was a thing of unexciting sonorities—heavy paced, unelegant.

Transcript Dec. 6

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestras

TO the Symphony Concerts of next week will come, for the first times this season, an "assisting artist"—Alexander Borovsky—Russian and Parisian pianist briefly and brilliantly heard in New York a year and more ago. He will play the solo-part in Prokoviev's Third Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, as yet unknown in America. If report go truly the music is objective, vivid, dry and bitin— quittle [illegible] o half way. For the remainder of the program Mr. Koussevitzky proposes familiar pieces: Respighi's arrangement of three ancient Italian dances, already heard here from both Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Monteux; the Symphony of Schumann in minor; Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." The Symphony should recommend those who believe Mr. Koussevitzky indifferent to the romantic German composers; while by the sign of "Till," the orchestra will sound its lost clarinet in A-flat.

CONCERT-CALENDAR

SUNDAY afternoon, Dec. 14, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its deserving and ever-needful Pension Fund. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct a band at the top of its bent; while for the first time, since its coming to America, he will be heard in the music of Chaikovsky. None other than [illegible] will stand on the program. The Fifth Symphony, the Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini" and the Serenade for Strings are the chosen [illegible]

Symphony

RECUPERATION, COMMEMORATION, TRANSFIGURATION

MR. KOUSSEVITZY AGAIN IN FULL FLOOD

Tribute to the Dead Faure in a Grave and Noble Prelude, a Graceful and Sighing Elegy—Ravel in the Full Panoply of Subtlety and Suggestion — Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" as Genius Sets It a-Striding and Aglow

AS the perversities of chance would have it, the Symphony Concert of yesterday was the more interesting for the illness that, earlier in the week, disabled Mr. Koussevitzky. Since it reduced him to a minimum of rehearsals, he was constrained to put by Skriabin's "Divine Poem," announced as final item. Now, whatever the merit of the Russian's pages—and this is not the time or the place to renew that embittered debate—two of his tone-poems within two months tend to excess. Last October Mr. Koussevitzky ended the first concerts with the "Poem of Ecstasy." He purposed to end the seventh pair, in December, with the "Divine Poem." No doubt, he would have made the second piece as exciting as he had made the first; but since Skriabin remains Skriabin, especially in American ears, not a few were content with the excitement deferred. Moreover, Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," in a version that veritably re-animated and re-created the music, was thrice ample compensation.

Mr. Koussevitzky had designed the concert as tribute to the memory of Gabriel Fauré, oldest and most widely esteemed of French composers, dead last month in Paris. Ravel happens to be Fauré's renowned pupil. Accordingly, the conductor set on the program Ravel's orchestral version of his own piano-piece, "Alborada del Gracioso." It is scored in sophisticated, meticulous fashion. Disabled over three days, Mr. Koussevitzky had no time to prepare the orchestra in it. Therefore, it gave place to the First Suite that Ravel drew from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," more familiar and less tricksome music. Fauré's two pieces—the Prelude to the opera, "Penelope" and the Elegy for Violoncello and Orchestra—were obviously not to be discarded. In one short day Mr. Koussevitzky prepared these numbers; added to them Ravel's Suite and Beethoven's Symphony; brought all four on Friday to signal performance. In emergency in America, it is useful to have been wandering conductor in Europe. There a Koussevitzky, a Weingartner, a Mengelberg, must often be content on his travels with a single rehearsal for an exacting concert. Given the orchestra, they learn to make the most of that brief preparation.

It is not easy to commemorate Fauré in a symphony concert. He wrote relatively little for orchestra; while that little seldom exemplifies his more characteristic veins. Chamber-music more enkindled and disclosed him, and he were best honored, in these days of mourning, by a program chosen from his sonatas, quartets, quintets and songs. Indeed, his music for the stage oftenest makes way into orchestral concerts, though it hardly abounds in detachable pieces. Possibly Mr. Koussevitzky dismissed as hackneyed the Suite from Fauré's incidental music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelléas and Mélisande." Anyhow, he chose for commemorative performance the Prelude to the master's best-esteemed opera, "Penelope," and the orchestral version of the Elegy for Violoncello. Five years ago, the inestimable Rabaud muddled through the Prelude at a pair of Symphony Concerts. Until yesterday the Elegy was new to them.

"Penelope" is music-drama of the return of Ulysses to home and country; of the wifely faith that Penelope kept against The Suitors, wasting the substance of her lord; of the swineherd's recognition, of the test with the hero's bow, of his vengeance upon those that had threatened his honor and defiled his house. Fauré conceived the opera almost as Grecian relief made animate and articulate upon a twentieth-century stage. That is to say, he wrote the music in chaste and sensitive line, with subtle inflections, suffused coloring, reticent emotion. With the outward shows of the operatic theater he was little concerned. Of the inner and spiritual states of his personages he would imply much. Racine-like, he would write, in the twentieth-century, French music-drama.

In the Prelude of yesterday passed hints of these quests attempted and achieved. It unfolds in grave and noble lines, neither rigid with austerities nor relaxed into softness. The motiv of Ulysses, the motiv of Penelope, fall upon the ear like contrasted couplets of Racine; while adroitly, delicately and richly the poet of tones and [illegible] poet of words clothe them, each in [illegible]

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RECOVERED

Koussevitzky Forced to Change List of Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Like the best laid plans, the most carefully arranged programmes may now and then come to grief.

Although, happily, Mr. Koussevitzky had sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to lead the Symphony Orchestra at the concert of yesterday afternoon, he had been able to attend but one rehearsal—that of Thursday morning. Hence the novel music planned for this programme in tribute to the memory of Gabriel Faure — Locatelli's "Funeral Symphony" and Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso"—must needs be laid aside, and under the circumstances it was also deemed expedient to replace Scriabin's "Divine Poem" with the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven.

BEDETTI PLAYS ELEGY

Yet with all these changes the programme still served, and appropriately enough, as memorial to Faure. At its head stood that composer's Prelude to the opera "Penelope," and the Elegy for Violoncello and Orchestra, with Mr. Bedetti for the soloist. As Faure's foremost pupil, Maurice Raval was still represented, but by the first series of excerpts from his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe." And the "Eroica," in which Beethoven wrote the noblest of all funeral marches, was wholly in place as final number.

Not by any orchestral concert, however, might Faure the composer be most fittingly remembered, for that distinguished and lamented musician wrote no symphonic music of the first importance. Although hardly practicable, it would then have been kinder to his memory to have brought to performance certain of his exquisite, harmonically sensitive songs and one or another of his chamber-pieces. For it was in those two fields of composition that Faure performed his work of genuine consequence.

Comes Down to Beethoven

Granting to it a certain grave beauty and a few arresting measures, the Prelude to "Penelope" is a piece all but dull. Nor is the Elegy much more than a superior sort of salon-music.

Of Ravel's Suite, furthermore, it can only be said that in interest it falls far below the second group of pieces drawn from the same ballet. The Nocturne and the Interlude seem relatively colorless, while the "Danse Guerriere" in no wise compares with the superb Bacchanale that closes the second Suite.

In the "Eroica," then, lay the real interest of this concert, and doubly grateful to hear was this mighty music after that which went before it. How far Mr. Koussevitzky had been able, in his one rehearsal, to work his will upon the orchestra may not safely be said. But at least yesterday's performance was one of uncommon eloquence, and incidentally it was one wholly free of the "liberties" of interpretation that made Mr. Koussevitzky's astounding version of the Fifth Symphony the subject of heated debate.

The purist might object, to be sure, to the adding of five more horns to Beethoven's three in moments of climax, but the effect thus gained was singularly impressive. And it should be noted that Mr. Koussevitzky's fine sense of tonal values forbade his doubling of the horns in the fanfares of the Scherzo, a procedure to which many another conductor has resorted.

As with the G minor symphony of Mozart, Mr. Koussevitzky gave the "Eroica" a respectful reading, yet one in which not a whit of its essential greatness was lost. Although the first movement, taken at the pace Beethoven surely intended when over it he wrote "Allegro con brio," was compellingly rhythmed, no expressive detail was slighted. The funeral march had due pathos and power and withal a noble dignity, while the finale was, as too often it is not, the fitting crown to the whole.

On his initial appearance yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky was welcomed by the audience with an unusual and emphatic cordiality, and there was warm applause for Mr. Bedetti's portion in the Elegy. But of the music of the afternoon, only the symphony provoked enthusiasm, a verdict from which there may be no dissenting.

Dec. 6

THE BOSTON HERALD, SA

7TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Gives Program in Memory of Gabriel Faure

PERFORMANCE IS FULL OF INTEREST

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky had arranged the following program in memory of Gabriel Faure, who died at Passy on Nov. 4: Locatelli's Funeral Symphony, Faure's overture to "Penelope and Elegy for violoncello and orchestra, Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" and Scriabin's "Divine Poem," but Mr. Koussevitzy's sickness and the consequent lack of rehearsal necessitated a change.

The program finally arranged and followed yesterday comprised these compositions: Faure, Overture to "Penelope" and "Elegy"; Ravel, Orchestral Fragments (first series) from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Beethoven, "Eroica" Symphony. That accomplished artist, Mr. Bedetti, played the violoncello solo in the "Elegy."

There was good reason for paying this tribute to Gabriel Faure, although he was not conspicuous as a writer of symphonic music for orchestra. He wrote a symphony but it was not published, though it was performed at a Cologne concert at Paris in 1885. A critic then wrote that "two of the three movements pleased, but the finale was "composed, without any precise musical idea, even the instrumentation lacked color." He added, "We advise the young composer to revise the whole of this movement before presenting the symphony again to the public" "Young Composer." Faure was then 40 years old, a mere child if Bernard Shaw's Sallie Hovey's extension of the age alloted to man by Moses in the Psalm attributed to him is to be considered seriously and accepted by those who would not dread being Struldbrugs, the unhappy immortals seen by Capt. Lemuel Gulliver in the Kingdom of Luggnagg.

Faure has been represented at the Symphony concerts by his exquisite music for "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music to "Shylock," a French version of "The Merchant of Venice" and the overture to "Penelope"—all music for the stage. His Ballade for piano and orchestra, his Allegro Symphonique; the Pavane and "La Sicilienne" have been ignored, perhaps with good reason, for they are not numbered among his important works even by the warmest admirers in his own country.

The true talent, one might say genius, of Faure is clearly revealed in his songs and chamber music. They are the work of a singularly sensitive composer, who, with Verlaine, valued the nuance more than the color. He is not a man for the crowd; he demands sensitive, poetic hearers, though his works have the clarity that is the glory of the best French literature and music. Though in a way a dreamer, his technic was not vague, not experimental. An admirer of Saint-Saens and his close friend, unlike him he was generously disposed toward the men of the younger school. He taught them, he encouraged them, though he probably smiled at the vagaries of those who put their trust in polytonality and wrote for the sake of making the bourgeois sit up. As a teacher he exerted a deep and beneficent influence not only for his own country, but for the whole musical world. His name will live long as the composer of some of the most beautiful songs in musical literature, of chamber music of a fine distinction, and as the teacher of musicians, who without aping his style—and Faure of all men possessed style—are true to his high standard, his poetic idealism, his purity of taste.

It was natural, then, that Ravel's name should be on this memorial program, for Ravel was a favorite pupil of Faure, and when he was debarred from competing for the grand prix de Rome by ultra-conservatives, though his talent had already been officially recognized, the exclusion vexed musical Paris and led to the appointment of Faure to the directorship of the Conservatory.

Apart from sentimental reasons, the concert was an interesting one. While the overture to Penelope" is not a commanding work, the performance glorified it. Mr. Bedetti played the Elegy as it should be played, not as a virtuoso piece, which would have been absurd, and in what one might call the truly Faureen manner. Ravel's music for a ballet was in keeping; especially the first two movements, and the brilliance of the third, the War Dance, gave the necessary contrast to what had gone before.

Some perhaps wondered, or expected, or hoped that Mr. Koussevitzky would take all sorts of improper liberties with Beethoven. If they wished for a sensational performance, that they might wax hysterical in praise or blame, they were disappointed. The interpretation was first of all musical in its emotional quality; it was characterised by impressive nobility, that did not preclude tenderness; it was dramatic, when intensity was demanded, but it was not theatrical; there was dignity without metronomic pedantry; and the Variations in the Finale were truly varied, running the gamut of expression. Nor should it be forgotten that Mr. Koussevitzky has a remarkable orchestra on which he can play at will and interpret music as it appeals to him.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will probably be as follows: Respighi, Four Old Dances and Airs for the Lute (freely arranged); Schumann, Symphony No. 4, D minor; Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 3 (first time in Boston; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Clarke
Dec 6

FAURE HONORED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Program in Memory of Dead Composer

The program of yesterday's symphony concert was dedicated to the memory of Gabriel Faure, the noted French composer who died at Paris Nov 4. Mr Koussevitzky conducted, despite his recent illness, which caused some changes in the pieces played. Faure's "Elegy," his overture to "Penelope," three fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony fill the program as given. The "Divine Poem" of Skriabin needs further rehearsals, and is postponed until later in the season.

Mr Hale in the program notes alluded to the fact that when Faure was first heard of in Boston people supposed that he was the same man who had composed "The Palms." No doubt many well meaning people even among the composer's acquaintance have thus blundered. For no work of Faure has ever become a "popular classic." You will not find his songs on radio programs nor his operas among those offered by touring companies. Yet his music has long been respected, admired, praised by musicians and amateurs. And yesterday the Boston Symphony gave him a tribute it reserves for the great.

Faure's music is the work of a man with subtle taste, the finest musical skill, an aristocrat by temperament. How few composers between 1870 and the present day have in their works shown the reticence, the habitual understatement, the shunnink of all that could be deemed exuberance that distinguish the work of Gabriel Faure.

Yet he was not a man without feeling because he never made gestures. To "Penelope," an opera on the return of Odysseus and the punishment of the suitors, he prefixed an overture, heard yesterday, which has a sombre coloring and an unperturbed emotion of which the English adjective "dreary" is a misleading approximate description. The French for it is "morne." His "Elegy" with a violoncello solo, well played by Mr Bedetti, is no less sombre. There is a certain monotony in his rythms and grayness in his tone color which for many obscures the real genius of Faure.

The pieces by Ravel played yesterday, fragments from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," showed to how great an extent Faure's most famous pupil has been influenced by his master. Ravel is an ironist, and a better colorist than his teacher. His harmonies are more daring, though no more original and personal than those of Faure. But how akin in tone their works are!

Through all the first half of the program was a grayness, a sadness wholly elegiac. Koussevitzky has not hitherto so perfectly kept that unity of mood and tone which used to charaterize many of Dr Muck's programs. And, although at first thought Beethoven's "Eroica" sympony might seem a contrast, Koussevitzky's interpretation remembers that Beethoven wrote it as a musical commentary on the career of Napoleon. True, the symphony was composed before Napoleon became Emperor, but there is a profounder truth in the composer's remark in 1821 when he heard the news from St Helena, "Did I not foresee the catastrophe when I wrote the Funeral March in the Eroica?"

Koussevitzky always seems to feel symphonies as imaginative units. One has never heard the "Eroica" as an elegy before, but after all is not that the truer intepretation? Should it not be played on Armistice Day? Were not those who played it in 1914 more optimistic than Beethoven was about the heroic life? The hero is here so plainly the hero of tragedy, not of battle pictures. As always the interpretations throughout the concert had the personal touch that Koussevitzky seldom fails to impart.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
DEC 6 1924

A little musical gathering that almost escaped notice was observed Thanksgiving Night at the Vanderbilt Hotel, following the concert given by the Boston Orchestra. The new Russian conductor of that organization, Serge Koussevitzky, once upon a time was hailed as a star performer upon the double bass fiddle, which while the largest of the instrumental family, doesn't get into society as a rule. But sixty local Russians, colleagues with whom Koussevitzky, at one time or another, had played the double bass, left their fiddles behind the door and, from their various duties in orchestras, theatres, ball rooms and concerts went forth to do honor to their distinguished comrade. Toasts were offered to those rollicking days of the gay double bass and many a fiddle prank was recalled by a reminiscent virtuoso.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT HERE

Famous Orchestra Under Leadership of Koussevitsky, New Conductor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Hartford this season for one concert under the leadership of its new conductor Serge Koussevitsky. The famous orchestra will be heard in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1 under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The return of this orchestra to the list of Hartford's notable musical offerings for the new year will be found doubly interesting because of the first appearance in this city of Mr. Koussevitsky, one of the world's truly great leaders. To real lovers of orchestral concerts, and they are legion, Mr. Koussevitsky's coming appearance is the high water wark in a season that is not without outstanding musical personalities.

The first New York concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall on Friday evening, November 28 and among other things Lawrence Gilman, musical critic of the New York Herald-Tribune said the following: "Certainly the chairs and standing room at Carnegie Hall could not have been more completely filled than they were last night; and at every point, where the polite inexorability of Mr. Koussevitsky would permit—at his entrances and culminations—the audience made manifest its enthusiastic approval of the new conductor, who for three years has set musical Europe by the ears. At the end of the concert, after Mr. Koussevitsky had borne them up into Scriabin's perfumed paradise on the frenetically mounting tides of that "Poeme de l'Extase" which he so dearly loves to set swirling about susceptible ears, they recalled him repeatedly to the stage. How often we cannot say; for when we left, the quite, well-groomed, rather melancholy figure was still coming out and bowing gravely to his first New York audience. The seats will be placed on sale Monday morning at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders also accepted.

Amer. Tel.
Dec 6
PAGE

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

KOUSSEVITZKY IN FINE FORM AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky resumed his post as Symphony conductor yesterday, showing scarcely a trace of the touch of grip that almost stopped his New York debut and kept him in bed for several days.

Serge Koussevitzky

The Friday matinee audience gave him a most cordial greeting, which he handsomely deserved in view of the heroic efforts he made in New York, where the orchestra scored one of its most impressive out-of-town triumphs last week.

Owing to Koussevitzky's inability to meet the regular rehearsal demands, the program first announced for the current concerts has been considerably changed. Gabriel Faure's "Penelope" overture and "Elegy" for 'cello solo and orchestra remain as a memorial to the distinguished French composer who died recently. Both pieces were played beautifully. Mr. Bedetti made one of his most artistic successes in solo part in the "Elegy."

REVISED PROGRAM

In place of the Locatelli "Funeral Symphony," Scriabin's "Divine Poem" and Ravel's "Alborado del Cragioso," the revised program offers Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony, and three excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, including the war dance.

It was all memorial music, in a sense, as Ravel studied with Faure and the Beethoven symphony contains one of the most imposing of all funeral marches.

In spite of a handicapping cold, Mr. Koussevitzky read the Ravel and

THIS CLIPPING FROM NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
DEC 6 1924

In New York

New York, Dec. 6.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

As a cub reporter I used to daydream of the time when I should be eye-witnes to a murder or a bank robbery and run to a telephone to give my paper an eight-column scoop on the opposition. Well, last night as I was walking down Eighth avenue, two West Indians started a fight a few feet in front of me. One was pushed through a plate glass window and the falling glass cut his jugular vein and he bled to death. In New York that story was hardly worth telephoning to a paper. And yet I believe I could write a fairly interesting column about the fight.

The head waiter in a midnight club asked his guests to keep their bottles off the tables the other night, as he had been tipped that a prohibition raid woulud be made that night. One guest pulled out a white opaque nursing bottle and toasts were drunk from the nipple.

—JAMES W. DEAN

THIS CLIPPING FROM COVINGTON, KY.
POST
DEC6 1924

New York Notes

SPATS AT WAR

By James W. Dean

NEW YORK, Dec. 6.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the women who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the women. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

* * *

Amer. Tel.
Dec 6

THIS CLIPPING FROM SUPERIOR, WIS.
TELEGRAM
DEC 6 1924

NEW YORK.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stowowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

ring Jacqueline Logan.

PENSION FUND.

The music of Tchaikovsky will be conducted for the first time here by Serge Koussevitzky, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the annual Winter Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, December 14. The program will include: the fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," serenade for strings, and the fifth Symphony in E minor.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

217

Boston Symphony Honors Memory of Gabriel Fauré

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, was:

Fauré—Overture to "Penelope."
Fauré—Elégie for Violoncello and Orchestra (Jean Bedetti, violoncello solo).
Ravel — Orchestral Fragments (First Series) from "Daphnis et Chloé."
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E flat major.

This program was in memory of Gabriel Fauré and fittingly included, in addition to the master's own compositions, one by his most distinguished pupil.

It is certain that Fauré's orchestral compositions are not his most characteristic works, and of them this overture, heard here under the sympathetic baton of Mr. Rabaud, is perhaps the least effective. It may be that the opera to which it serves as a prelude is one of the greatest productions of French art. Of that we have not the means to judge, but as a purely orchestral piece, torn from its true setting, it is but dismal music indeed. In it there is scarcely a trace of the Fauré so well known and loved in his songs and chamber music, the Fauré of the Nocturnes and Barcarolles for the piano, the Fauré who so admirably and delicately mirrored in his music the most subtle emotional distinctions. This greater Fauré was better felt in the all too short Elégie, almost every measure of which bears the imprint of his surpassing genius.

But if the very nature of his genius did not permit a due tribute to be paid it in a purely orchestral concert, the tribute was none the less sincere and touching on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Bedetti, and the orchestra. All played from their hearts, and their respect and admiration for the master were amply shown in their playing of his music.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted yesterday for the second time the music of Beethoven. If the principal interest of the symphony concerts centers around his personality, as some would have it, there was little to justify such a statement in his interpretation of the third symphony. It would seem that no greater purity of style, no greater respect for Beethoven's work could be demanded by the most ardent lover of his music. It was played with nobility and lofty simplicity; there was not the slightest trace of searching effect for effect's sake; there were no attempts at original "readings" of this or that passage. It was a performance replete with sympathetic understanding of the music, not one easily to be bettered nor likely to be soon forgotten. S. M.

Amer.
Dec 6

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 6 1924

CELEBRATED PIANIST IN CONCERT HERE

Alexander Borovsky, the celebrated pianist, will be the soloist of the evening at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in Infantry hall next Tuesday. It was at first thought that Borovsky would not be able to appear on account of a delay in his sailing from Europe.

Weber's overture to Oberon will introduce this concert and it will end with brief excerpts from the music dramas of of Richard Wagner—the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and the funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusks of the Gods."

210

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 6 1924

BOROVSKY TO APPEAR HERE ON TUESDAY WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Will Make Providence Debut at Infantry Hall.

Alexander Borovsky, celebrated pianist, will be the soloist of the evening at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday. It was at first thought that Borovsky would not be able to appear on account of a delay in his sailing from Europe. News has come, however, that he has arrived in America and will make his first Providence appearance at this concert. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G-major accepted as one of the greatest scores in that form.

Alexander Borovsky is better known in Europe than in America, although he gave two recitals in Carnegie Hall, New York, a year ago and attracted favorable attention. Born in Russia in 1889, Borovsky was long known in his own country. It was not until 1921 that he played in western Europe.

Weber's Overture to Oberon will introduce this concert and it will end with brief excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser;" the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and the Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods." The music of Siegfried has never before been performed in Providence at these concerts owing to the almost doubled brass section which it requires. An addition to the Infantry Hall stage is being built to accommodate the increased number of musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN

DEC 6 1924

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its Cambridge season last night in Sanders Theatre, Harvard. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program included selections by Mozart, Debussy, Prokofieff and Rimsky-Korsakov.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 6 1924

* * *

Programs of the seventh pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in that city were arranged in memory of Gabriel Faure, the great French composer, who died recently at the age of 79. Jean Bedetti, 'cello soloist of the orchestra, who has played in Hartford, was scheduled to perform Faure's "Elegie" for violin and orchestra, and another number of interest was the late composer's "Overture" to "Penelope."

* * *

more to follow 12/8 10th

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.

TRIBUNE

DEC 7 1924

They like Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, after having heard him in New York. They speak of his dramatizing imagination, his intensity, and his passion for accentuation, adding, however, that his desire to italicize everything sometimes leads into undue languishings. It is at least evident that he takes little for granted.

Providence Journal Dec 7

Boston Symphony to Interpret Wagnerian Excerpts

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There is no music with which an orchestra of sufficient size and competence may more easily gain an effect than with that of Wagner. Yet, paradoxically, it is only a supremely great conductor who can bring this music to its fullest effectiveness. And in Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra has to-day such a conductor.

In Boston recently Mr. Koussevitzky made an overpowering impression by his interpretation of three Wagnerian excerpts; the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; the Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods"; and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"—three pieces in which Providence is to hear the orchestra under his direction at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening.

When at the instance of Napoleon III., "Tannhauser" was to be mounted at the Paris Opera, Wagner, urged by that impulse known as the artistic conscience, rewrote and greatly extended the Bacchanale and the subsequent scene between Tannhauser and Venus, although in doing so he put new difficulties in the way of performance and without doubt did little to further the cordial reception of the opera. For it seems likely that the Parisians of that day, to whom "Tannhauser" proved a baffling and incomprehensible affair, would have been better pleased with the earlier and simpler version.

Nevertheless, if the Parisians of 1860 failed to appreciate Wagner's additional efforts in their behalf, the world to-day is well aware that this remodelled first scene takes rank among its composer's finest achievements. With but slight exaggeration it can be said that the so-called Paris version of the Bacchanale (and the one always played as an orchestral excerpt) is to the Bacchanale of 1845 as a finished masterpiece in oils is to the charcoal sketch that preceded it. Music of sensuous frenzy and of sensuous languor, after 64 years this Bacchanale is still irresistible in its initial sweep and fury, still piercingly beautiful in its tenderly voluptuous conclusion.

As the Bacchanale reveals to us the Wagner who was, in Lawrence Gilman's felicitous phrase, "the master evocator of erotic enchantments," so does the Funeral Music of Siegfried disclose him, equally unsurpassable, in wholly different vein. Siegfried the hero has been treacherously slain and as his body is borne away there comes from the orchestra no mere funeral march but a recital in tones of Siegfried's race and birth, of his love and triumph, that is an instrumental eulogy of the highest eloquence. From the faintest roll of the kettle-drum this music swells to a blinding radiance of tone—and sinks again.

Yet great as the Wagner of the Funeral Music and of the Bacchanale indubitably is, there are not a few who hold that even greater is the Wagner who in "The Mastersingers" hymned the emotions of the common folk in music that so magically blends beauty and musical scholarship. Certain it is that, regarded from any point of view, the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" is a masterpiece among masterpieces.

Besides these Wagnerian excerpts Mr. Koussevitzky's programme includes one other piece in which he has been heard in Boston: Weber's Overture to "Oberon," but and Mozart's Symphony in G Minor, but the remaining item, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, in which Alexander Borovsky will bear the solo part, has not appeared in a Boston programme since Mr. Koussevitzky's arrival among us.

Weber's greatest overtures—that is to say, those to "Der Freischutz," "Euryanthe" and "Oberon"—are war-horses that some feel have been ridden well-nigh to death by conductors of all degrees. Yet Mr. Kossevitzky proves by his remarkable interpretation of the one to "Oberon" that there is need only of a quickening impulse to render these pieces once more vital and persuasive, while Weber's instrumentation remains ever a thing of wonder in its anticipation of so much that is associated with a later musical day.

For many concert-goers a concerto is primarily the vehicle for the solo pianist, 'cellist or violinist; yet there are concertos, though they are few enough, that of themselves hold high places in symphonic music, and of that company are the last two piano concertos of Beethoven, the so-called "Emperor" and the one that Mr. Borovsky has chosen for performance Tuesday evening. Incidentally in the first movement of this Concerto Beethoven struck a blow at tradition by the assigning of the opening bars to the piano rather than to the orchestra. And the slow movement, a dialogue in which the gentle pleadings of the piano are answered by stern utterances of the strings, is one of its composer's happiest conceptions.

Chang... Symphony Programme

Some changes have been ... programme of the Boston S... chestra for next Tuesday ... announcements, because of th... ment of Alexander Borovsky, the ... pianist, as soloist. Mr. Borovsk... scheduled to come, but delayed his ... parture from Europe so long that it wa... feared he would not arrive in season. Word was received the past week that he would land in America in time for his appearance here. The Bach concerto and De Falla novelty announced last week have therefore been omitted, and Beethoven's fourth concerto for piano substituted.

Another item of interest in connection with the concert is that the orchestra will bring the largest personnel it has ever had in a Providence concert. The ponderous "Funeral Music" of Siegfried from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods" has never been played by the Boston organization here before, because the stage of Infantry Hall would not accommodate the necessary instruments. A way has now been devised to enlarge the stage enough to permit the doubling of the brasses and percussion instruments, and the orchestra will number over 100. The programme is discussed in detail elsewhere in this department.

Mr. Borovsky, the soloist, is so far known in America principally by his two recitals in New York last autumn, which attracted a great deal of attention. He was born in Russia in 1889. He received his musical education from his mother, a noted pianist, and from Essipoff of the Leningrad Conservatory. Long admired in that part of the world, he did not appear in western Europe until 1921, when he took part in the music festival conducted in Paris by Koussevitzky. There followed a series of concerts in Paris, London, Berlin and many other cities. From Europe and from New York there have come many reports of his brilliance and artistic qualities.

The programme which he and the orchestra will play now runs in the following order: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in G-minor (Koechel, No. 550), Mozart, Allegro molto, Andante, Menuetto; trio, Finale; Allegro assai; Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in G-major, op. 58, Beethoven, Allegro moderato, Andante con moto, Rondo (Vivace); Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill," from "Tannhauser," Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

Mr. Koussevitzky's recent debut in New York was a repetition of the thunderous occasion in Boston. In Carnegie Hall crowded houses greeted him "stuffed to bursting with anticipatory excitement," according to Lawrence Gilman in the New York Herald Tribune. The applause was extremely cordial at first, but not, naturally, significant, said Deems Taylor.

"But as the evening wore on," he continues, "Mr. Koussevitzky must have noticed a change in the character of the applause, an ever-quickening interest and enthusiasm that culminated in a torrent of handclaps and scattered cheers at the end of the concert. The impression he made was profound."

Ernest Newman of the Evening Post looked upon the programme as possibly designed to destroy at once the "absurd legend" that he is a sensational conductor. "As it happens," he wrote, "control which the merely sensational conductor always lacks, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's strongest points. . . . No one could doubt that here was a conductor who, however deeply he may feel a piece of music, however thoroughly he may be immersed in it, yet paradoxically stands right outside it, seeing it as a sculptor sees a statue, and modelling it as a sculptor models."

Through the "Oberon" overture Mr. Newman saw him as a "water-color painter, a lover of soft lines and delicate washes." Mr. Gilman considered his two outstanding traits "a dramatizing imagination" and "a passion for accentuation." W. J. Henderson in the Sun discovered through the conductor's playing of "Pacific 231," an "entirely novel virtue," and that he "uncovered thematic traits and pointed instrumental utterances hitherto unperceived."

The Times called attention to "a new musical rivalry, one of the kind that always fascinates the public" between Koussevitzky and Stokowski of the Philadelphia Orchestra, but said that "the great fact of the moment, however, is that Koussevitzky has restored, in the eyes of the local public, the old fascination that the concerts of the Boston Symphony once had, and that, by the same token, he is making a fresh and threatening attack on the position of undisputed orchestral supremacy that Stokowski has held in this city in late years."

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

Alexander Borovsky will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. He will play with the orchestra in the Third Piano Concerto of Prokofieff. The program will also include Respighi's series of ancient dances for the lute, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Mr. Borovsky was long prominent in Russia, his own country, before he was heard in the western world. He first appeared in Paris in 1921 under Mr. Koussevitszky's direction and made his Amercian debut a year ago in Carnegie Hall, New York.

WILLIAMS COLLEGE

...e engage-
...Russian
...was
...de-
...s

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

DEC 7 1924

Koussevitzky's New York debut, Nov 27, and the second New York concert, Nov 29, were triumphs as great as the Boston debut last October for the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. There was a chorus of praise from the New York reviewers. Only one notice, Pitts Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail, was unfavorable. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post, and Olin Downes in the Times, were enthusiastic. Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune admitted that Koussevitzky is a conductor of the first rank, but objected to his tendency to go to extremes of pianissimo and fortissimo. A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, five Monday evenings in Boston, nine Thursday evenings in Cambridge, five Thursday evenings in New York, five Saturday matinees in New York.

The only way people without season tickets can now hear the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky hereabouts is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons, for which no tickets are issued, or wait in line for the unreserved balcony over the stage at the Cambridge concerts, or buy single tickets for the extra concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Perhaps the ticket agencies have a few season tickets which they sell singly, but if so the premium is high. Moral, buy your season ticket for next year early. Unless you put your name on a waiting list now you may not get a ticket, as most of them are reengaged by subscribers from year to year.

And hearing the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky is nearly always a stirring emotional experience. Never within the past 15 years to the certain knowledge of the present writer, and probably never in the history of the orchestra has the Friday afternoon audience responded so keenly to any and all music played. The new conductor vitalises everything he touches.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LOS ANGELES,
CAL.
TIMES

DEC 7 1924

MONSTER LOCOMOTIVE INSPIRES COMPOSER

Arthur Honegger's new work "Pacific 231" seems to have provided a real thrill for lovers of the bizarre in music. Honegger is one of the famous "Six of Paris," high priests of modernism. His "Pacific 231" was brought to America by Koussevitsky and played by the Boston Symphony at the new conductor's debut. It caused a stir, as it did later at Aeolian Hall in New York, when Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony performed it.

The composer declares the work to be an expression in music of the "visual impression and physical sensation" of one of the gigantic Pacific type of locomotives. It is the first time that the steam engine has appeared in connection with symphonic music. Nevertheless, Honegger has contrived to make it the motive force for a striking and original work. The orchestra gives a tone-picture of the metal giant in its slow, laboured start, with the snort and roar and thunder of its breathing as it gains momentum. Clouds of acrid smoke are belched into the tonal skies, metal joints clash and clang, the relentless rhythm of mighty pistons drives the iron monster at ever-increasing speed. With a shrieking of piccolos and a series of grinding, ear-torturing chords, the great bulk is brought to a gradual stop.

"Best by attest"
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
DEC 7 1924

PUCCINI KNEW WELL HOW TO APPLY ALL HIS TALENT TO DRAMATIC COMPOSITIONS

Late Composer Was Essentially a Composer for the Theater, Key Asserts—Music Lovers Following Rivalry Between Noted Conductors, Koussevitzky and Stokowski.

E V. R. KEY.

[o The Gazette Times.]

record concerning Serge Koussevitsky after having attended two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he ~~re recently~~ led in this city. Nor am I alone in that decision. Koussevitsky surprised by the very absence of those sensational qualities—some of them visual—which he was expected to display.

He did not twist his body, nor fling his arms wildly, nor lean over the stand. He resorted to no mysterious motions of the left hand common to some prima donna conductors who dote on such help to move an assemblage. He was dignified, reposeful, authoritative. And he seemed thoroughly sincere.

Koussevitsky had drilled his musicians to sand-papered fineness. They were with him to the last man; and they played superbly, in point of tone, technique, and shading. Perhaps I am a trifle too previous, yet I cannot believe this Russian newcomer will show less on future appearances than he did on those two occasions in Carnegie Hall. It looks as though Boston has acquired a master-leader.

Without there being any announcement to that effect, this current season will witness a rivalry for conducting honors between Koussevitsky and Leopold Stokowski, the brilliant leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Stokowski's followers will unconsciously resist the heaping of plaudits upon the newcomer's head. They are loyal to their blond musician, and he can do no wrong.

All the same, Stokowski will not have quite so much of the limelight as he has heretofore. Koussevitsky is not alone a man who takes hold of one's music sensibilities; he is a personality. And such a reading as he gave Debussy's nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes. Their clarity, delicacy, transparency were of a quality I cannot recall having heard before.

The Oberon overture seemed to be altogether too free—in both tempi and dynamics. But the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ was performed with nobility of the phrase line and a genuinely classic glory. Passing over Pacific 231 as impossible music, we come to the Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy. It is over-long and has some dry stretches; yet Koussevitsky extracted from it some real color.

The second program—which contained Brahms' fourth symphony—put the Russian visitor to a still severer test. At the outset it should be stated that it was a different interpretation than some of our recognized conductors favor. There was some dragging of the tempi in the passacaglia; there was less of that adherence to traditional markings elsewhere to which most of us are accustomed. Still, the variations were not such as to offend seriously fair-minded symphony concert patrons. For Koussevitsky makes Brahms live.

Moussorgsky, Glinka and Prokofieff were the other composers represented on this second program, and

Opinion of Koussevitsky.

You may like or dislike a conductor while first listening to his effects and seeing him at work, but such impressions are not invariably final. One needs to sit through several programs, widely contrasted in their array of compositions, before reaching a conclusive estimate.

For all this I am tempted to go on

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
DEC 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING HERE ON MARCH 25

To Be First Appearance of New Conductor

It is definitely announced today that the Portland Music Commission has the Boston Symphony orchestra under contract for a concert in City Hall Auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 25. This is news that will be received with the greatest interest and enthusiasm by musicians and the public, for it marks the first opportunity Portland has had to hear this great orchestra under the baton of its new conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, who has leaped into popular favor so rapidly that he threatens the supremacy of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, in the New York music world.

For the first time since the star of Dr. Karl Muck was in the ascendency, the Boston Symphony's series of concerts in New York City is virtually subscribed for weeks ahead, and the appearance of the brilliant Russian conductor is creating a great furore wherever he goes. Portland is therefore assured of hearing the Boston Symphony at its best, and that means that its performance will be indeed superlative.

Whether the Boston Symphony is presented as a single concert or as a part of the municipal music course depends entirely upon the assurances of public support which are given to the contemplated concert series under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. If this course is inaugurated, the Boston Symphony concert will be of the regular concerts of the winter course, and will be offered at the reduced rate which is made possible by the combination.

Otherwise it will be offered at the customary price of a symphony concert.

But in any event, whatever plan is adopted, the Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky are assured.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS TO CITY

Famous Orchestra and Great Conductor Here February 1.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in one concert in Hartford this season after an absence of two years. This supreme musical event, incidently the only orchestral concert of the season, comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, an auspices long and favorably known to local concertgoers. The beautiful and spacious Capitol Theater will house this important musical event which means that a minimum price will be charged for a maximum of entertainment and comfort. The concert is scheduled for Sunday afternoon, February 1.

The coming of this famous orchestra is made doubly interesting because it introduces the orchestra's new conductor and one of the world's greatest musicians, Serge Koussevitsky, newly come to the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fresh from his triumph in Paris. Mr. Koussevitsky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. Serge Koussevitsky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Previous to this season he was named as the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

The seats for this musical event will be placed on sale Monday morning at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum Street. Mail orders will also be accepted. All orders and checks should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick.

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitzky's New York debut, Nov 27, and the second New York concert, Nov 29, were triumphs as great as the Boston debut last October for the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. There was a chorus of praise from the New York reviewers. Only one notice, Pitts Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail, was unfavorable. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post, and Olin Downes in the Times, were enthusiastic. Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune admitted that Koussevitzky is a conductor of the first rank, but objected to his tendency to go to extremes of pianissimo and fortissimo. A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, five Monday evenings in Boston, nine Thursday evenings in Cambridge, five Thursday evenings in New York, five Saturday matinees in New York.

The only way people without season tickets can now hear the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky hereabouts is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons, for which no tickets are issued, or wait in line for the unreserved baloony over the stage at the Cambridge concerts, or buy single tickets for the extra concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Perhaps the ticket agencies have a few season tickets which they sell singly, but if so the premium is high. Moral, buy your season ticket for next year early. Unless you put your name on a waiting list now you may not get a ticket, as most of them are reengaged by subscribers from year to year.

And hearing the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky is nearly always a stirring emotional experience. Never within the past 15 years to the certain knowledge of the present writer, and probably never in the history of the orchestra has the Friday afternoon audience responded so keenly to any and all music played. The new conductor vitalises everything he touches.

[illegible] "Nocturne," Cui; [illegible] Netherlands folk song.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighth program. Old Dances, Respighi; Third Piano Concerto, Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspiegel," Strauss; Fourth Symphony, Schumann. Soloist, Alexander Borovsky. (First time in Boston.)

Sunday, Dec 14, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Concert in aid of the Pension Fund. Tchaikovsky program; Fifth Symphony, in E minor; Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"; Serenade for strings. There will be no soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER
DEC 7 1924

INTERESTING SIDELIGHTS ON THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Vladimir Dubinsky, well-known 'cellist and teacher and a companion in his youth of Serge Koussevitzky, who appeared in New York recently as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, writes The New York Times of early days spent with the conductor, as follows:

The engagement of Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra brings to me many memories of days of our youth. They are concerned mostly with Koussevitzky as the wonderful bass player I knew him to be, for it was long before any one, even Koussevitzky himself, conceived the idea of taking up the baton.

Koussevitzky studied at the Music Dramatic School of the Moscow Philharmonic society. I was a pupil at the Moscow Imperial conservatory. We were both advanced students, and in vacation time during one summer we accepted positions with a symphonic orchestra to play at a seashore place called Mayorenhoff, situated on the Baltic sea near Riga, now the capital of Latvia.

As there were very few Russians there, Koussevitzky and I were drawn close and we became "pals." Koussevitzky's name in Russian is Sergei, and for short, Serioja. He was a lovely chap—amiable and congenial. He was also ambitious, energetic and determined in his decisions, but very modest about his ability as a musician. In my opinion, no matter what instrument he had studied, he would have attained the same great results that he reached on the bass viol.

Especially I used to love practicing together on our respective instruments. We would start with scales, go over to 'cello studies, and wind up with concertos. Koussevitzky would play along, keeping pace with the 'cello on the bass fiddle. There was no limitation for him.

Listening to Koussevitzky one would forget that he was playing a bass; it wasn't a bass at all, it was some instrument between a 'cello and a bass, of unusual beauty. He possessed everything that makes a great artist—tone, technical equipment, temperament, repose, a keen sense of rhythm and fine conception.

At the close of our season in Mayorenhoff Koussevitsky learned of a vacancy in the orchestra of the St. Petersburg Imperial Grand Opera theater and he decided to compete for it. The aspirants were mostly graduates from the local conservatory. One among them was pointed out to Koussevitzky as the "star" who would certainly get the position. Koussevitzky was a stranger, unknown and looked upon with a condescension.

The contest began. Koussevitzky was the first one called to play. Before he commenced he explained to the judges that he always tuned his instrument one tone higher than the customary pitch for the sake of brilliancy and clarity. But while Koussevitzky was tuning the instrument one of the jurors, who happened to be the professor for the bass department in the conservatory of St. Petersburg (later Petrograd and now Leningrad), stopped him, objecting to this unusual tuning as a trick.

As I said before, Koussevitzky was very determined in his decision. He immediately addressed the chairman of the jury, who overruled the objection, leaving to the artist the use of his instrument as he saw fit.

When Koussevitzky had finished, there was spontaneous applause, against all rules, from audience as well as jury. Half the number of the contestants left the place, deciding not to compete at all. The position was awarded to Koussevitzky without much deliberation by every vote, except of course, the professor's.

Then came a surprise. Koussevitzky, having won the position, refused to accept it. He had his reasons. Each desk in the orchestra of the court opera had a different salary, and some of the men used to play twice a week for the ballet performances, for which extra remuneration was due.

It happened that the desk of the position in question was not supposed to play the ballet. On this ground Koussevitzky rejected the position to the amazement of the entire theatrical administration.

It was an unheard thing for a musician to refuse a position in the Imperial theater. The Russian Imperial theaters were offering to their musicians at that time a year's salary for about eight or nine months' service, a full pension after twenty years, or half pension after ten years of service; sick benefits; free education for the children of employees, and last but not least, the title of artist of imperial theaters, which was of no little significance in a country where division of classes existed, as it did in Russia; this title meant a good deal for social and civil standing.

However, Koussevitzky secured a similar position in the Moscow Court theater, where his desk was also playing the ballet performances. In a year or so he was advanced to the first desk as the first bass player at the Moscow grand opera and from that time on his fame began to grow.

Of Koussevitzky as the conductor and orchestra organizer, I learned while I was already in this country. I am conversant with the fact that the press had acclaimed him wherever he appeared at the head of an orchestra. I can say only this much: that if he directs the orchestra the way he played the bass violin when I knew him, he must be a remarkable orchestra leader.

Dec. 7

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who conducts his first all-Tchaikowsky program next Sunday.

RUSSIAN PIANIST WITH SYMPHONY

Alexander Borovsky will appear as the first soloist of the season at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play with the orchestra the third piano [illegible] of Prokofieff. Serge Koussevitzky will also present Respighi's "Dances for the Lute," Schumann's symphony in [illegible] minor, and Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Borovsky was prominent in Russia before he appeared in Paris in 1921 under Koussevitzky. He made his American debut a year ago in New York.

"Best by attest"
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
DEC 7 1924

PUCCINI KNEW WELL HOW TO APPLY ALL HIS TALENT TO DRAMATIC COMPOSITIONS

Late Composer Was Essentially a Composer for the Theater, Key Asserts—Music Lovers Following Rivalry Between Noted Conductors, Koussevitzky and Stokowski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
TELEGRAM
DEC 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING HERE ON MARCH 25

To Be First Appearance of New Conductor

It is definitely announced today that the Portland Music Commission has the Boston Symphony orchestra under contract for a concert in City Hall Auditorium on Wednesday evening, March 25. This is news that will be received with the greatest interest and enthusiasm by musicians and the public, for it marks the first opportunity Portland has had to hear this great orchestra under the baton of its new conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, who has leaped into popular favor so rapidly that he threatens the supremacy of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, in the New York music world.

For the first time since the star of Dr. Karl Muck was in the ascendency, the Boston Symphony's series of concerts in New York City is virtually subscribed for weeks ahead, and the appearance of the brilliant Russian conductor is creating a great furore wherever he goes. Portland is therefore assured of hearing the Boston Symphony at its best, and that means that its performance will be indeed superlative.

Whether the Boston Symphony is presented as a single concert or as a part of the municipal music course depends entirely upon the assurances of public support which are given to the contemplated concert series under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. If this course is inaugurated, the Boston Symphony concert will be of the regular concerts of the winter course, and will be offered at the reduced rate which is made possible by the combination. Otherwise it will be offered at the customary price of a symphony concert.

But in any event, whatever plan is adopted, the Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky are assured.

Opinion of Koussevitsky.

You may like or dislike a conductor while first listening to his effects and seeing him at work, but such impressions are not invariably final. One needs to sit through several programs, widely contrasted in their array of compositions, before reaching a conclusive estimate.

For all this I am tempted to go on record concerning Serge Koussevitsky after having attended two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he conducted in this city. Nor am I alone in that decision. Koussevitsky surprised by the very absence of those sensational qualities—some of them visual—which he was expected to display.

E V. R. KEY.

[The Gazette Times.]

He did not twist his body, nor fling his arms wildly, nor lean over the stand. He resorted to no mysterious motions of the left hand common to some prima donna conductors who dote on such help to move an assemblage. He was dignified, reposeful, authoritative. And he seemed thoroughly sincere.

Koussevitsky had drilled his musicians to sand-papered fineness. They were with him to the last man; and they played superbly, in point of tone, technique, and shading. Perhaps I am a trifle too previous, yet I cannot believe this Russian newcomer will show less on future appearances than he did on those two occasions in Carnegie Hall. It looks as though Boston has acquired a master-leader.

Without there being any announcement to that effect, this current season will witness a rivalry for conducting honors between Koussevitsky and Leopold Stokowski, the brilliant leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Stokowski's followers will unconsciously resist the heaping of plaudits upon the newcomer's head. They are loyal to their blond musician, and he can do no wrong.

All the same, Stokowski will not have quite so much of the limelight as he has heretofore. Koussevitsky is not alone a man who takes hold of one's music sensibilities; he is a personality. And such a reading as he gave Debussy's nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes. Their clarity, delicacy, transparency were of a quality I cannot recall having heard before.

The Oberon overture seemed to be altogether too free—in both tempi and dynamics. But the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ was performed with nobility of the phrase line and a genuinely classic glory. Passing over Pacific 231 as impossible music, we come to the Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy. It is over-long and has some dry stretches; yet Koussevitsky extracted from it some real color.

The second program—which contained Brahms' fourth symphony—put the Russian visitor to a still severer test. At the outset it should be stated that it was a different interpretation than some of our recognized conductors favor. There was some dragging of the tempi in the passacaglia; there was less of that adherence to traditional markings elsewhere to which most of us are accustomed. Still, the variations were not such as to offend seriously fair-minded symphony concert patrons. For Koussevitsky makes Brahms live.

Moussorgsky, Glinka and Prokofieff were the other composers represented on this second program, and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 7 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS TO CITY

Famous Orchestra and Great Conductor Here February 1.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in one concert in Hartford this season after an absence of two years. This supreme musical event, incidently the only orchestral concert of the season, comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, an auspices long and favorably known to local concertgoers.

The beautiful and spacious Capitol Theater will house this important musical event which means that a minimum price will be charged for a maximum of entertainment and comfort. The concert is scheduled for Sunday afternoon, February 1.

The coming of this famous orchestra is made doubly interesting because it introduces the orchestra's new conductor and one of the world's great-

Serge Koussevitzky,

...ROYAL ARDEHAN WILL...
...I$ ..... SEATS
...I$ ..... VILLONS
...I$ ..... VILLONS
...I$ ..... VILLONS

...e conductor was thoroughly at ...me with them.

A Tireless Rosina.

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitzky's New York debut, Nov 27, and the second New York concert, Nov 29, were triumphs as great as the Boston debut last October for the new conductor of the Boston Symphony. There was a chorus of praise from the New York reviewers. Only one notice, Pitts Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail, was unfavorable. Deems Taylor in the World, W. J. Henderson in the Sun, Ernest Newman in the Evening Post, and Olin Downes in the Times, were enthusiastic. Lawrence Gilman in the Herald-Tribune admitted that Koussevitzky is a conductor of the first rank, but objected to his tendency to go to extremes of pianissimo and fortissimo. A more tangible evidence of the unparalleled success of Koussevitzky is the fact that every ticket is now sold for the season for the following series, comprising nearly every concert offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, five Monday evenings in Boston, nine Thursday evenings in Cambridge, five Thursday evenings in New York, five Saturday matinees in New York.

The only way people without season tickets can now hear the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky hereabouts is to stand in line for one of the 505 rush seats in the second balcony Friday afternoons, for which no tickets are issued, or wait in line for the unreserved baloony over the stage at the Cambridge concerts, or buy single tickets for the extra concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Perhaps the ticket agencies have a few season tickets which they sell singly, but if so the premium is high. Moral, buy your season ticket for next year early. Unless you put your name on a waiting list now you may not get a ticket, almost of them are reengaged by subscribers from year to year.

And hearing the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky is nearly always a stirring emotional experience. Never within the past 15 years to the certain knowledge of the present writer, and probably never in the history of the orchestra has the Friday afternoon audience responded so keenly to any and all music played. The new conductor vitalises everything he touches.

...Nocturne," Cui; Prayer ... Netherlands folk song.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighth program. Old Dances, Respighi; Third Piano Concerto, Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspiegel," Strauss; Fourth Symphony, Schumann. Soloist, Alexander Borovsky. (First time in Boston.)

Sunday, Dec 14, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Concert in aid of the Pension Fund. Tchaikovsky program; Fifth Symphony, in E minor; Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"; Serenade for ...rings. There will be ... soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REGISTER
DEC 7 1924

217

INTERESTING SIDELIGHTS ON THE CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Vladimir Dubinsky, well-known 'cellist and teacher and a companion in his youth of Serge Koussevitzky, who appeared in New York recently as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, writes The New York Times of early days spent with the conductor, as follows:

The engagement of Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra brings to me many memories of days of our youth. They are concerned mostly with Koussevitzky as the wonderful bass player I knew him to be, for it was long before any one, even Koussevitzky himself, conceived the idea of taking up the baton.

Koussevitzky studied at the Music Dramatic School of the Moscow Philharmonic society. I was a pupil at the Moscow Imperial conservatory. We were both advanced students, and in vacation time during one summer we accepted positions with a symphonic orchestra to play at a seashore place called Mayorenhoff, situated on the Baltic sea near Riga, now the capital of Latvia.

As there were very few Russians there, Koussevitzky and I were drawn close and we became "pals." Koussevitzky's name in Russian is Sergei, and for short, Serioja. He was a lovely chap—amiable and congenial. He was also ambitious, energetic and determined in his decisions, but very modest about his ability as a musician. In my opinion, no matter what instrument he had studied, he would have attained the same great results that he reached on the bass viol.

Especially I used to love practicing together on our respective instruments. We would start with scales, go over to 'cello studies, and wind up with concertos. Koussevitzky would play along, keeping pace with the 'cello on the bass fiddle. There was no limitation for him.

Listening to Koussevitzky one would forget that he was playing a bass; it wasn't a bass at all, it was some instrument between a 'cello and a bass, of unusual beauty. He possessed everything that makes a great artist—tone, technical equipment, temperament, repose, a keen sense of rhythm and fine conception.

At the close of our season in Mayorenhoff Koussevitsky learned of a vacancy in the orchestra of the St. Petersburg Imperial Grand Opera theater and he decided to compete for it. The aspirants were mostly graduates from the local conservatory. One among them was pointed out to Koussevitzky as the "star" who would certainly get the position. Koussevitzky was a stranger, unknown and looked upon with a condescension.

The contest began. Koussevitzky was the first one called to play. Before he commenced he explained to the judges that he always tuned his instrument one tone higher than the customary pitch for the sake of brilliancy and clarity. But while Koussevitzky was tuning the instrument one of the jurors, who happened to be the professor for the bass department in the conservatory of St. Petersburg (later Petrograd and now Leningrad), stopped him, objecting to this unusual tuning as a trick.

As I said before, Koussevitzky was very determined in his decision. He immediately addressed the chairman of the jury, who overruled the objection, leaving to the artist the use of his instrument as he saw fit.

When Koussevitzky had finished, there was spontaneous applause, against all rules, from audience as well as jury. Half the number of the contestants left the place, deciding not to compete at all. The position was awarded to Koussevitzky without much deliberation by every vote, except of course, the professor's.

Then came a surprise. Koussevitzky, having won the position, refused to accept it. He had his reasons. Each desk in the orchestra of the court opera had a different salary, and some of the men used to play twice a week for the ballet performances, for which extra remuneration was due.

It happened that the desk of the position in question was not supposed to play the ballet. On this ground Koussevitzky rejected the position to the amazement of the entire theatrical administration.

It was an unheard thing for a musician to refuse a position in the Imperial theater. The Russian Imperial theaters were offering to their musicians at that time a year's salary for about eight or nine months' service, a full pension after twenty years, or half pension after ten years of service; sick benefits; free education for the children of employees, and last but not least, the title of artist of imperial theaters, which was of no little significance in a country where division of classes existed as it did in Russia; this title meant a good deal for social and civil standing.

However, Koussevitzky secured a similar position in the Moscow Court theater, where his desk was also playing the ballet performances. In a year or so he was advanced to the first desk as the first bass player at the Moscow grand opera and from that time on his fame began to grow.

Of Koussevitzky as the conductor and orchestra organizer, I learned while I was already in this country. I am conversant with the fact that the press had acclaimed him wherever he appeared at the head of an orchestra. I can say only this much: that if he directs the orchestra the way he played the bass violin when I knew him, he must be a remarkable orchestra leader.

Adv. Section
Dec. 7

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who conducts his first all-Tchaikowsky program next Sunday.

RUSSIAN PIANIST WITH SYMPHONY

Alexander Borovsky will appear as the first soloist of the season at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play with the orchestra the third piano ... of Prokofieff. Serge Koussevitzky will also present ... Respighi's "Dances for the L...," Schumann's symphony in ... minor, and Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Borovsky was prominent in Russia before he appeared in Paris in 1921 under Koussevitzky. He made his American debut a ... ago in New York.

220

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 7 1924

Changes in Symphony Programme

Some changes have been made in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next Tuesday since earlier announcements, because of the engagement of Alexander Borovsky, the Russian pianist, as soloist. Mr. Borovsky was scheduled to come, but delayed his departure from Europe so long that it was feared he would not arrive in season. Word was received the past week that he would land in America in time for his appearance here. The Bach concerto and De Falla novelty announced last week have therefore been omitted, and Beethoven's fourth concerto for piano substituted.

Another item of interest in connection with the concert is that the orchestra will bring the largest personnel it has ever had in a Providence concert. The ponderous "Funeral Music" of Siegfried from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods" has never been played by the Boston organization here before, because the stage of Infantry Hall would not accommodate the necessary instruments. A way has now been devised to enlarge the stage enough to permit the doubling of the brasses and percussion instruments, and the orchestra will number over 100. The programme is discussed in detail elsewhere in this department.

Mr. Borovsky, the soloist, is so far known in America principally by his two recitals in New York last autumn, which attracted a great deal of attention. He was born in Russia in 1889. He received his musical education from his mother, a noted pianist, and from Essipoff of the Leningrad Conservatory. Long admired in that part of the world, he did not appear in western Europe until 1921, when he took part in the music festival conducted in Paris by Koussevitzky. There followed a series of concerts in Paris, London, Berlin and many other cities. From Europe and from New York there have come many reports of his brilliance and artistic qualities.

The programme which he and the orchestra will play now runs in the following order: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in G-minor (Koechel, No. 550), Mozart, Allegro molto, Andante, Menuetto; trio, Finale; Allegro assai; Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in G-major, op. 58, Beethoven, Allegro moderato, Andante con moto, Rondo (Vivace); Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill," from "Tannhauser," Funeral Music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods," Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

Mr. Koussevitzky's recent debut in New York was a repetition of the thunderous occasion in Boston. In Carnegie Hall crowded houses greeted him "stuffed to bursting with anticipatory excitement," according to Lawrence Gilman in the New York Herald Tribune. The applause was extremely cordial at first, but not, naturally, significant, said Deems Taylor.

"But as the evening wore on," he continues, "Mr. Koussevitzky must have noticed a change in the character of the applause, an ever-quickening interest and enthusiasm that culminated in a torrent of handclaps and scattered cheers at the end of the concert. The impression he made was profound."

Ernest Newman of the Evening Post looked upon the programme as possibly designed to destroy at once the "absurd legend" that he is a sensational conductor. "As it happens," he wrote, "control which the merely sensational conductor always lacks, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's strongest points. . . . No one could doubt that here was a conductor who, however deeply he may feel a piece of music, however thoroughly he may be immersed in it, yet paradoxically stands right outside it, seeing it as a sculptor sees a statue, and modelling it as a sculptor models."

Through the "Oberon" overture Mr. Newman saw him as a "water-color painter, a lover of soft lines and delicate washes." Mr. Gilman considered his two outstanding traits "a dramatizing imagination" and "a passion for accentuation." W. J. Henderson in the Sun discovered through the conductor's playing of "Pacific 231," an "entirely novel virtue," and that he "uncovered thematic traits and pointed instrumental utterances hitherto unperceived."

The Times called attention to "a new musical rivalry, one of the kind that always fascinates the public" between Koussevitzky and Stokowski of the Philadelphia Orchestra, but said that "the great fact of the moment, however, is that Koussevitzky has restored, in the eyes of the local public, the old fascination that the concerts of the Boston Symphony once had, and that, by the same token, he is making a fresh and threatening attack on the position of undisputed orchestral supremacy that Stokowski has held in this city in late years."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD
DEC 7 1924

• • •

Serge Koussevitsky.

You may like or dislike a conductor while first listening to his effects and seeing him at work, but such impressions are not invariably final. One needs to sit thru several programs, widely contrasted in their array of compositions, before reaching a conclusive estimate.

For all this I am tempted to go on record concerning Serge Koussevitsky after having attended two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he so recently led in this city. Nor am I alone in that decision. Koussevitsky surprised by the very absence of those sensational qualities—some of them visual—which he was expected to display.

He did not twist his body, nor fling his arms wildly, nor lean over the stand. He resorted to no mysterious motions of the left hand common to some prima donna conductors who dote on such help to move an assemblage. He was dignified, reposeful, authoritative. And he seemed thoroly sincere.

Koussevitsky had drilled his musicians to a sand-papered fineness. They were with him to the last man; and they played superbly, in point of tone, technique, and shading. Perhaps I am a trifle too previous, yet I cannot believe this Russian newcomer will show less on future appearances than he did on those two occasions in Carnegie Hall. It looks as tho Boston has acquired a master-leader.

* * *

Rivalry For Honors.

Without there being any announcement to that effect, this current season will witness a rivalry for conducting honors between Koussevitsky and Leopold Stokowski, the brilliant leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Stokowski's followers will unconsciously resist the heaping of plaudits upon the newcomer's head. They are loyal to their blond musician, and he can do no wrong.

All the same, Stokowsky will not have quite so much of the limelight as he has heretofore. Koussevitsky is not alone a man who takes hold of one's music sensibilities; he is a personality. And such a reading as he gave Debussy's nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes. Their clarity, delicacy, transparency were of a quality I can not recall having heard before.

The Oberon overture seemed to be altogether too free in both tempi and dynamics. But the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ was performed with nobility of the phrase line and a genuinely classic glory. Passing over Pacific 231 as impossible music, we come to the Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy. It is overlong and has some dry stretches; yet Koussevitsky extracted from it some real color.

The second program—which contained Brahms' fourth symphony—put the Russian visitor to a still severer test. At the outset it should be stated that it was a different interpretation than some of our recognized conductors favor. There was some dragging of the tempi in the passacaglia; there was less of that adherence to traditional markings elsewhere to which most of us are accustomed. Still, the variations were not such as to offend seriously fair-minded symphony concert patrons. For Koussevitsky makes Brahms live.

Moussorgsky, Glinka, and Prokofieff were the other composers represented on this second program, and the conductor was thoroly at home with them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
DEC 7 1924

— Gray Little.

The Koussevitskys are being feted socially in Boston. Mr. Koussevitsky, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as his pictures show, is a most personable young man, of fine appearance and courtly manners, and his wife is equally attractive. Mr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky were guests of honor at one of the most important receptions of the week last Wednesday afternoon at the Harvard Music Hall in Cambridge. In the receiving line was Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, wife of the president of Harvard University, with Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. E. Burlingame Hill, wife of Professor Hill, Mrs. Paul Sachs, Mrs. Edward W. Forbes and others. The ladies presiding at the tea table included Mrs. Arthur Pope, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick S. Converse, Mrs. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. E. C. Morre, Mrs. A. K. Porter, Mrs. George Edgell and Mrs. Philip Spalding.

The Koussevitskys will be met in Portland later in the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
DEC7 1924

ARTHUR HONEGGER'S new work, "Pacific 231" seems to have provided a real thrill for lovers of the bizarre in music. Honegger is one of the famous "Six of Paris," high priests of modernism. His "Pacific 231" was brought to America by Koussevitsky and played by the Boston Symphony at the new conductor's debut. It caused a stir, as it did later at Aeolian hall in New York, when Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony performed it.

The composer declares the work to be an expression in music of the "visual impression and physical sensation" of one of the gigantic Pacific type of locomotives. It is the first time that the steam engine has appeared in connection with symphonic music. Nevertheless, Honegger has contrived to make it the motive force for a striking and original work. The orchestra gives a tone-picture of the metal giant in its slow, labored start, with the snort and roar and thunder of its breathing as it gains momentum. Clouds of arid smoke are belched into the tonal skies, metal joints clash and clang, the relentless rhythm of mighty pistons drives the iron monster at ever-increasing speed. With a shrieking of piccolos and a series of grinding, ear-torturing chords, the great bulk is brought to a gradual stop.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WHEELING,
W. VA.
TELEGRAPH
DEC8 1924

IN NEW YORK

New York, Dec. 8.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham! Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

As a cub reporter I used to daydream of the time when I should be eye-witness to a murder or a bank robbery and run to a telephone to give my paper an eight-column scoop on the opposition. Well, last night as I was walking down Eighth avenue, two West Indians started a fight a few feet in front of me. One was pushed through a plate glass window and the falling class cut his jugular vein and he bled to death. In New York that story was hardly worth telephoning to a paper. And yet I believe I could write a fairly interesting column about the fight.

The head waiter in a midnight club asked his guests to keep their bottles off the tables the other night, as he had been tipped that a prohibition raid would be made that night. One guest pulled out a white opaque nursing bottle and toasts were drunk from the nipple.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
Kokomo Ind
DEC8 1924

In New York

New York, Dec. 5.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors — Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN,
CONN.
RECORD
DEC 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREAT ORCHESTRA HARTFORD FEB. 1

The Boston Symphony orchestra will visit Hartford this season for one concert under the leadership of its new conductor Serge Koussevitsky. The famous orchestra will be heard in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1 under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The return of this orchestra to the list of Hartford's notable musical offerings for the new year will be found doubly interesting because of the first appearance there of Mr. Koussevitsky, one of the world's truly great leaders. To real lovers of orchestral concerts, and they are legion, Mr. Koussevitsky's coming appearance is the high water mark in a season that is not without outstanding musical personalities.

The first New York concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall on Friday evening, November 28 and among other things Lawrence Gilman, musical critic of the New York Herald-Tribune said the following: "Certainly the chairs and standing room at Carnegie Hall could not have been more completely filled than they were last night; and at every point where the polite inexorability of Mr. Koussevitsky would permit—at his entrances and culminations—the audience made manifest its enthusiastic approval of the new conductor, who for three years has set musical Europe by the ears. At the end of the concert, after Mr Koussevitsky had borne them up into Scriabin's perfumed paradise on the frenetically mounting tides of that "Poeme de l'Extase" which he so dearly loves to set swirling about susceptible ears, they recalled him repeatedly to the stage. Seats on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street, Hartford. Mail orders also accepted.

Transcript
December 9

...rigilla...
...arce."

Rakhmaninov's Isle

Persistent but diminishing, the debate continues over the ways of conductors in Symphony Hall with Rakhmaninov's tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and over the content and import of the music itself. Before it quite dies down, it is worth while to reprint the note of Mr. Gilman in the program-book of the Philharmonic Society of New York when it played the piece a week or two ago. There is insight in it:

Böcklin [whose like-named pictures suggested the music] might have taken for the motto of his most celebrated canvas the opening lines of the sonnet by Thomas Hood:

There is a silence where hath been no sound;
There is a silence where no sound may be.

...ndeed, Böcklin is said to have remarked of his picture that "it must produce such an effect of stillness that anyone would be frightened to hear a knock on the door." The lonely, sunless island, awful in its solitude, with frowning cliffs and mournful cypress trees, rising out of a windless sea; the boat that is slowly nearing the ... with its mysterious cargo, the lative fervor.

Transcript Dec. 9

Musorgsky for Orchestra

With prudent precaution, Mr. Koussevitzky has reserved to the Boston Orchestra and himself Ravel's symphonic version of Mursorgsky's piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." At present no other band in these parts may play it. For a jealous publisher in Paris, a journeyman, Leonardi by name, made a rival transcription. Upon it Mr. Damrosch laid hands and last week he included it in a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. It is within the truth to say that neither audience nor reviewers received it rapturously. In fact, the chroniclers of concerts dismissed it, for the most part, as briefly as did their brethren in Paris. As it happens, Sir Henry Wood's version for his orchestra in London much excels Leonardi's; while sooner or later, Mr. Koussevitzky will bear Ravel's to New York.

From Sir Henry, however, Mr. Damrosch borrowed for the same concert in New York an arrangement for orchestra and tenor voice of Musorgsky's satirical song, "The Peep-Show," a mixture of mockery and parody aimed at divers reviewers of Petersburg in the seventies. "The humor," says The Times of the music, "is rather

Continued on Following Page

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Providence music folk soon may be asking one another, "Did yon hear Koussevitsky?" rather than "Did you hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra?" Such a condition of affairs would only be the natural consequence of the tremendous effect this remarkable conductor produces on the minds of Boston Symphony patrons. Last evening the magnetic Russian and his players paid their second visit of the season. Infantry Hall was filled.

The programme gave promise of something unusual both in content and in performance. Memories of Koussevitsky's first appearance here and what he accomplished with his orchestra on that occasion aroused keen anticipation. These anticipations were more than realized for the orchestra gave the most impressive the most thrilling performance ever heard at these concert within the memory of the writer. The audience, roused to a high pitch of enthusiasm, fairly overwhelmed conductor and men with applause. Alexander Borovsky, pianist, appearing fo the first time here, proved a worthy soloist for the accosion.

This was the programme:

Weber .....Overture to "Oberon"
Wagner ...Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill" from "Tannhouser"
Wagner..Funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods"
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

Teh Weber overture to "Oberon" has been played in this city season after season, but who among Boston Symphony patrons ever heard last evening's performance equalled? When have the players answered so magnificently the directing mind? It was a new Weber, a new "Oberon" that delighted us.

In what manner, by what means di Mr. Koussevitsky accomplish this wonder? The answer is simple. The Boston orchestra's new leader is a man who inspires his men. They admire and respect his gifts. They respond as if they were part and parcel of his artistic conceptions. He, in turn is a musician whose mind is free from the shackles of convention. His imagination soars above and beyond what others have found in "Omeron's" notes. His musical design drawn from the score is one of contrast. The gentle flow of melody is made softer until it seems remote, mysterious. It rises and falls gently as the summer wind. Dhen life and vigor enter the scene they are portrayed in tempo and spirit that quicken the pulse. All is contrived with an artistry that compels admiration.

Further and more complete proof of Mr. Koussecitsky's accomplishments came to light in the Wagnerian excerpts. In the last analysis can there be found music that equals Wagner's massive tone pictures? The works of this master musician seem to fill the mind. Although familiar to the ear they bring with each repetition a sense of something new, something that the spirit craves and—finds. In this music the orchestra rose to the heights. The men played as one. In the strings there was depth, sonority, brilliance and the brass and wood-wind fulfilled their tasks with equal beauty.

Mr. Borovsky played the Liszt Concerto in E-flat major. The latter part works up to a great climax in true Lisztian style. It is a concerto that gives the player opportunity to reveal technique and requires the possession of tremendous strength of finger and arm. The artist dominated the full orchestra in the finale, a truly astonishing feat, for usually in such tremendous tonal battles the pianist is submerged.

Mr. Borovsky is a player that interests by his full, musical tone and coherent style. He was recalled several times after his brilliant performance.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 10 1924

Boston Symphony Plays Its Second Concert Here

Old Favorites Blossom and New Members Gain Charm Under Koussevitsky

Under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky old masters and old favorites are blossoming into the full flower of musical worth and new numbers are being presented in a way that lends an added charm to polish of technique and wealth of expression.

Last night in Infantry Hall, in the second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitsky omitted the playing of a symphony, substituting a program which included Liszt's concerto in E-flat major. The soloist was Alexander Borovsky a young pianist whose work was much appreciated by the audience.

This concerto, which resembles nothing quite so much as the glorious imaginings of a lazy summer afternoon, was played with sympathetic understanding and a careful attention to detail. The orchestral accompaniment, under Koussevitsky's reading, brought out all that brilliance of color for which most of the Hungarian composer's works are noted.

Weber's Overture to "Oberon," which affords opportunity for the technician, opened the program. After the concerto came the introduction and Bacchanale from scene 2 of the first act of the Paris version of Wagner's "Tannhauser." The wild revel on the Venus hill which is dispelled by the Three Graces gave the conductor just the sort of theme again to show his capacity for chalking out a colorful tone etching. It strikes the ear vividly as a startling canvas to the eye, each detail of the mad, exotic scene brushed with meticulous care—Wagnerian in its simplicity of telling, fired by the genius of a conductor who knows a good story in music and has the ability to tell it in na manner both convincing and easy of understanding.

Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," the families "Gotterdammerrung" interpreted by Koussevitsky, voiced the wild grandeur of half savage chieftains, an echo of the ancient days in the Black Forest when Germanic hordes roamed to conquest, the musical epitaph of a fargone day when there was a reverent, pagan glory in the hero's death in battle. It is savage, but it is beautiful.

The more popular prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" was played with a fine finish and, in keen appreciation of Wagner's intent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
DEC 10 1924

Wagner Rendered by Boston Symphony

Providence Heard Wagner Last Night as It Has Never Been Played Here Before

The Boston Symphony gave its second concert last night at Infantry Hall under the spirited leadership of Serge Houssevitsky.

The program included: Weber, overture to "Oberon," Liszt, Concerto, F-flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra; Wagne, Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill" from "Tannhauser," Wagner, Funeral Music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The soloist was Alexander Borowsky.

There is a story that an Englishman who visited Beyruth before the war to hear Wagner's "Ring" played and upon his return home wrote an article with the theme that a nation which could produce a Wagner and adored a Wagner was a nation to be feared.

Last night the terrific energy of the great German artist was brought out by M. Houssevitsky and his orchestra. And not only the strength of Wagner but also his sustained lovelimess, the depths of the richness of his immortal love music.

It was an inspiration to watch M Houssevitsky and an unequalled pleasure to listen to the orchestra. One saw him truly draw, by his magic and genius, the best from his group. By persuasion and by command, and always with force, his well-knit body in harmony with the workings of his intense musical intelligence, his arms and his fingers executing, like a fairy wand, strange and marvelous wonders. M. Houssevitsky convinced those who may have suspended judgment after the first concert that at last the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a leader who will guide it to new honors and richer distinction.

The Wagner numbers give some idea of the tremendous genius of the man, the world he created, with its love music that sighs, its dances that bring thoughts of the rhythmic current of the world in which unearthly people moved, its conception, in bold notes, of heroism and grandeur, and its dignity in the face of inevitable death. Providence heard Wagner last night as it has never been player here before

Alexander Borovsky, a countryman of Houssevitsky's who is making his first appearance in this country, matched, with his strength, the challenge of Liszt. The difficult text of Father Liszt was read, not only with the power called for but also with sympathy and understanding by M. Borovsky. He was recalled for five bows by the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
DEC 10 1924

Boston's Viewpoint

TO her disappointment the Boston Symphony was in New York when she was visiting Boston. And she had wanted to hear it there. She spoke of her disappointment in not hearing it to her Boston friend, who replied:

"Yes, it's too bad, my dear. But they're off touring the provinces just now."

Incidents and Prospect

Misadventure constrains Mr. Koussevitzky to alter the announced program for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. He expected Mr. Borovsky to bring from Paris the score and the orchestral parts of Prokoviev's Third Piano-Concerto. The diligent pianist, however, could nowhere lay hand upon those parts; while there is not time, here in Boston, to have them copied from the full score. Consequently, Prokoviev's Concerto recedes into a dim future; while in its stead Mr. Borovsky and Mr. Koussevitsky will play Chalkovsky's Concerto in B-flat minor—still a resplendent music, unheard as it happens, these ten years at Symphony Hall—and an ancient Concerto of Corelli for Piano and Strings This change in program has lead to others; the dropping of Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the playing of four instead of three of Respighi's ancient dances. The list of pieces now stands:

Old Dances and Airs for the Lute Freely Arranged .....Respighi
Concerto for Piano and Strings.....Corelli
(Pianist: Mr. Borovsky)
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in B-flat minor .....Chalkovsky
(Pianist: Mr. Borovsky)
Rondo for Orchestra, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" .....Strauss

Pawtucket Times
Dec 10

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as its leader and Alexander Borovsky soloist of the evening, visited Providence last night in the second of its series of five concerts to be given here this season. Infantry Hall, the battleground of over a hundred musical instruments, was packed to capacity. It was evident by the enthusiastic applause accorded Koussevitzky as he proceeded to take command of his musical army, that his last appearance in Providence created an impression that was firmly imbedded in the minds of many in the audience. Koussevitzky is a Russian and, like Rachmaninoff, pays but little tribute to convention. Again inspiration and imagination seemed to be his impelling forces. To say that he exercised an hypnotic influence over the members of his orchestra would not be exaggeration.

The programme opened with the overture to "Oberon" by Carl Weber. This overture was written by Weber under the greatest of difficulty two years before his death. As a sick and discouraged man he betook himself to the task of learning the English language in order to more clearly understand the text. It was first produced in London for Covent Garden. "Oberon" has been played here several times before. It conveyed an entirely new meaning to many of the audience last night.

The next number featured Alexander Borovsky, soloist of the evening, in the Concerto in E-flat major by Franz Liszt. As is so in practically all music written by Liszt, this concert was fiery and brilliant and tremendously difficult. It calls for great strength on the part of the pianist to maintain his leading role in the great climax of the concerto. Borovsky was well chosen for the task and his first appearance in this locality has left a deep impression on those who heard him.

The remainder of the programme consisted of three Wagnerian excerpts as follows: Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill," from "Tannhauser;" funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and a prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Nothing but great praise and admiration can be accorded to Koussevitzky in his interpretation of these massive tonal pictures.

The entire programme was a complete success and one long to be remembered by its listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

New York Season Now Sold Out—Orchestra With Koussevitsky Firmly and Popularly Established.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, regarded in the days of Dr. Karl Muck as the greatest symphonic organization in the world, is once again looked upon as the leader in that line, with the assumption of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor.

So sensational was the orchestra's 1924-1925 debut in New York this year the entire twenty concerts are sold out solid in advance and four extra concerts will be given in New York. In addition, about a half a dozen concerts will be played in Brooklyn, while Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington are also on the Boston's visiting list for four concerts this season, and Frank A. Sedgwick has arranged to present this famous orchestra at the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1, for one concert only.

Pierre Monteux has been the conductor for the last five years. It is generally conceded he did much to rehabilitate an organization practically shattered after Dr. Muck left America amid a frenzy of anti-German feeling which swept the country during the war days.

Koussevitsky came here touted as a miracle man, a super conductor, a genius whose like has never been seen in America. Consequently when he appeared in New York for his debut most of the critics, by their own admission, were ready to pick flaws in plenty.

Koussevitsky routed his critics and made the audience practically continue its ovation long after the last horn had sounded. The seat sale for this intriguing event is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted.

22

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
DEC 10 1924

As New York Sees It

BY JAMES

NEW YORK, Dec. 10.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors: Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats

NEW YORK
Variety
DEC3 1924

BOSTON'S 20 CONCERTS SELLOUT IN NEW YORK

Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitsky Firmly and Popularly Established

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, regarded in the days of Dr. Karl Muck as the greatest symphonic organization in America, is once again looked upon as leader in that line, with the assumption of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor.

So sensational was the orchestra's 1924-1925 debut in New York this year the entire 20 concerts are sold out solid in advance and four extra concerts will be given in New York. In addition, about half a dozen will be played in Brooklyn, while Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington are also on the Boston's visiting list for four concerts a season.

Pierre Monteux was conductor last year. It is generally conceded he did much to rehabilitate an organization practically shattered after Dr. Muck left America amid the frenzy of anti-German feeling which swept the country during the war days.

Koussevitzky came here touted as a miracle man, a super conductor, a genius whose like has never been seen in America. Consequently, when he appeared in New York last week for his debut most of the critics, by their own admission, were ready to pick flaws in plenty. Koussevitsky routed his critics and made the audience practically continue its ovation long after the last horn had sounded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
DEC6 1924

Hearty Welcome

Accorded Koussevitzky Upon His New York Debut—Huge Audience Taxed Capacity of Carnegie Hall

Ever since Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first concert of the current season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hub City concertgoers of New York have awaited with keen interest the coming of this brilliant conductor to New York. Further reports of the Boston concerts but served to increase this keen interest and the result is that the entire subscription series for the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is reported as being sold out. Thanksgiving Night was chosen for the debut appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky in New York and the huge audience which assembled taxed the capacity of Carnegie Hall to the extreme limits of the fire laws, and when the new conductor appeared on the platform he was greeted with an outburst of applause which continued for several minutes and certainly should have convinced him that New York was eager to welcome him. He chose as the opening number of the program, Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra which was given a most excellent reading and under his skillful guidance there was evidence this early in the evening of great improvement in the playing of the orchestra. Then followed Weber's overture to Oberon, which appears so often on orchestral programs that it has become tiresome to this writer, but, as played under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, assumed new beauty and every note was listened to with much interest and the audience, too, evidently greatly enjoyed it, as at its close the conductor was recalled to the platform repeatedly and the orchestra also shared with him the applause.

Two numbers by Debussy were given with a beauty of tone which made them stand out as one of the high lights of the concert. Next came Honneger's Pacific 231, which has been played several times before in the New York season, and this too received close attention from the audience and again there was long and loud applause. The concert was closed with Scriabin's Le Poeme de l'extase, in the directing of which the new conductor further proved his skill as a leader for he obtained tonal effects such as one has not heard from the Boston Orchestra in many seasons.

Altho one must needs hear other concerts directed by Mr. Koussevitzky before reaching a conclusion as to his ability, if this first concert is to be taken as a criterion, we prophesy that ere long the Philadelphia Orchestra and Mr. Stokowski will need to look to their laurels. We do not mean the Boston organization is at present in the same class with that of Philadelphia, but, in our estimation, it does surpass any of the New York ones, and given a few more months' work under Mr. Koussevitzky, we believe there is every possibility it may be a contender for first honors with the Philadelphia body, which organization at present, in our opinion, is the best orchestral body in this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. LEDGER
DEC 6 1924

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

For some reason or other New York has never had the best orchestral players. It never had a Longy; it had a Tabuteau and was not able to keep him. It never had a Kneisel, a Witck or a Thaddeus Rich as concertmeister; it never had an Anton Horner, or a Max Hess, although Jaenicke is more than pretty good. And the list might be prolonged indefinitely between the Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago orchestras. But, after all, the "firsts" of an orchestra, aside from the sensationalism of a few names (and it must be admitted, the work of some of the solo instruments) do not make a really great orchestra.

... Owing to the state of public opinion, an effort was made to graft French conductors upon an organization whose roots were wholly German.

There could be but one result and it happened with surprising thoroughness; the Boston Orchestra lost everything but the recollection of a glorious past; its Philadelphia concerts were abandoned because, according to the management, there were "too many demands for its services at home," and therefore some of the trips had to be canceled.

Really it was because with the kind of orchestral music that we were hearing from the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski, who by that time had started to make the organization the world's finest orchestra, the playing of the Bostonians no longer had box office attractions, despite its prestige; and the presence of a few of its best artists in the period of its greatest glory. Some of the performances given here under M. Rabaud and later M. Monteux were so ragged as to playing and so dubious as to interpretation as almost to suggest no rehearsals of the program and little understanding of the music.

The New York concerts, however, were continued, probably in the delusion, common in the country, that a New York success means a national triumph—which is not at all the case. But at any rate the New York concerts were maintained, but not with any great results from artistic or box office standards.

In the meantime, with this opportunity before it, New York failed to come to the front with an organization capable of taking the place of the Boston Orchestra with its trailing clouds of glory almost gathering the dust, so low were they. The Philadelphia Orchestra leaped into the breach and became the premier attraction of the famous "little old city"—you know the rest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 10 1924

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as its leader and Alexander Borovsky soloist of the evening, visited Providence last night in the second of its series of five concerts to be given here this season. Infantry Hall, the battleground of over a hundred musical instruments, was packed to capacity. It was evident by the enthusiastic applause accorded Koussevitzky as he proceeded to take command of his musical army, that his last appearance in Providence created an impression that was firmly imbedded in the minds of many in the audience. Koussevitzky is a Russian and, like Rachmaninoff, pays but little tribute to convention. Again inspiration and imagination seemed to be his impelling forces. To say that he exercised an hypnotic influence over the members of his orchestra would not be exaggeration.

The programme opened with the overture to "Oberon" by Carl Weber. This overture was written by Weber under the greatest of difficulty two years before his death. As a sick and discouraged man he betook himself to the task of learning the English language in order to more clearly understand the text. It was first produced in London for Covent Garden. "Oberon" has been played here several times before. It conveyed an entirely new meaning to many of the audience last night.

The next number featured Alexander Borovsky, soloist of the evening, in the Concerto in E-flat major by Franz Liszt. As is so in practically all music written by Liszt, this concert was fiery and brilliant and tremendously difficult. It calls for great strength on the part of the pianist to maintain his leading role in the great climax of the concerto. Borovsky was well chosen for the task and his first appearance in this locality has left a deep impression on those who heard him.

The remainder of the programme consisted of three Wagnerian excerpts as follows: Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill," from "Tannhauser;" funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and a prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Nothing but great praise and admiration can be accorded to Koussevitzky in his interpretation of these massive tonal pictures.

The entire programme was a complete success and one long to be remembered by its listeners.

NEW YORK
MUSICAL AMERICA
DEC6 _1924

BUFFALO WELCOMES SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Resident Symphony Under Two Conductors Is Also Much Applauded

By F. W. Balch

BUFFALO, Nov. 29.—A welcome of especial cordiality was extended to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, on his initial appearance here on Nov. 13. It is difficult to recall when an audience has given such pronounced evidence of its enthusiasm as on this occasion. The concert was the second number in the Musical Arts given under Bessie Bellanca. The program included Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's D Major Concerto, orchestrated by Max Steinberg; Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the "Vocalise," by Rachmaninoff, "Dubinouchka," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the prelude to "Khovantchina," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," from "Tsar Saltan," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Buffalo Symphony opened its season in Elmwood Music Hall, on Nov. 16, before a capacity audience. Arnold Cornelissen, in the dual rôle of conductor and piano soloist, was much applauded, as was also Richard Hageman, guest conductor. Mr. Cornelissen's Concerto, dedicated to the Buffalo Chromatic Club, was a feature of the program. Under Mr. Hageman Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was finely read. Mr. Cornelissen conducted Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the "Rienzi" Overture.

The city's newest musical enterprise, the First Settlement Music School, sponsored by the Buffalo Chromatic Club, by other organizations and resident musicians, was given a benefit in the Playhouse on Nov. 17. Lillian Woodward Street, reader; R. Leon Trick, pianist, and Helen Durrett, violinist, attracted a large audience. The First Settlement Music School will give lessons to pupils in moderate circumstances.

The Chromatic Club presented Amy Corey Fisher, pianist; Lillian Willcocks Ferris, soprano, and Franklin Riker, tenor, in an interesting concert in the Playhouse, on Nov. 15. Mrs. Ferris disclosed an attractive voice and met with a cordial reception. Mr. Riker showed interpretative skill. Mrs. Fisher was equally successful.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, drew a large audience to Elmwood Music Hall, Nov. 18. His own compositions were heard with particular pleasure and his mastery was in evidence in every number.

The American Artists' Club, of which A. A. Van De Mark is president and founder, opened its Wednesday dinner-musicales recently. Helen Garret Mennig, pianist; Hildred Morrow, soprano, and Ruth Pettit, contralto, were the artists, giving an attractive program. Mr. Van De Mark gave a brief address.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MUSICAL AMERICA
DEC6 _1924

Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Edward Burlingame Hill, Mrs. Paul Sachs and Mrs. Edward W. Forbes were hostesses on Nov. 19 at the reception given in Paine Hall, Harvard music building, Cambridge, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Koussevitzky. At the tea tables were Mrs. Arthur Pope, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mrs. A. K. Potter, Mrs. George Edgell, Mrs. Philip Spalding and Mrs. E. C. Moore.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MUSICAL AMERICA
DEC6 _1924

Koussevitzky Ill; Concertmaster Leads Concert in Brighton, Mass.

[By Telegraph to MUSICAL AMERICA]

BRIGHTON, MASS., Dec. 2.—Owing to the sudden indisposition of Serge Koussevitzky, the concert of the Boston Symphony on the evening of Dec. 1 was conducted by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin gave an excellent account of himself in a difficult program. HENRY LEVINE.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 9 1924

NEW YORK, Dec. 9.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski

222

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
DEC 10 1924

BY JAMES

NEW YORK, Dec. 10.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia Orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors: Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 10 1924

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as its leader and Alexander Borovsky soloist of the evening, visited Providence last night in the second of its series of five concerts to be given here this season. Infantry Hall, the battleground of over a hundred musical instruments, was packed to capacity. It was evident by the enthusiastic applause accorded Koussevitzky as he proceeded to take command of his musical army, that his last appearance in Providence created an impression that was firmly imbedded in the minds of many in the audience. Koussevitzky is a Russian and, like Rachmaninoff, pays but little tribute to convention. Again inspiration and imagination seemed to be his impelling forces. To say that he exercised an hypnotic influence over the members of his orchestra would not be exaggeration.

The programme opened with the overture to "Oberon" by Carl Weber. This overture was written by Weber under the greatest of difficulty two years before his death. As a sick and discouraged man he betook himself to the task of learning the English language in order to more clearly understand the text. It was first produced in London for Covent Garden. "Oberon" has been played here several times before. It conveyed an entirely new meaning to many of the audience last night.

The next number featured Alexander Borovsky, soloist of the evening, in the Concerto in E-flat major by Franz Liszt. As is so in practically all music written by Liszt, this concert was fiery and brilliant and tremendously difficult. It calls for great strength on the part of the pianist to maintain his leading role in the great climax of the concerto. Borovsky was well chosen for the task and his first appearance in this locality has left a deep impression on those who heard him.

The remainder of the programme consisted of three Wagnerian excerpts as follows: Bacchanale, "The Venus Hill," from "Tannhauser;" funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and a prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Nothing but great praise and admiration can be accorded to Koussevitzky in his interpretation of these massive tonal pictures.

The entire programme was a complete success and one long to be remembered by its listeners.

NEW YORK
Variety
DEC 3 1924

BOSTON'S 20 CONCERTS SELLOUT IN NEW YORK

Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitsky Firmly and Popularly Established

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, regarded in the days of Dr. Karl Muck as the greatest symphonic organization in America, is once again looked upon as leader in that line, with the assumption of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor.

So sensational was the orchestra's 1924-1925 debut in New York this year the entire 20 concerts are sold out solid in advance and four extra concerts will be given in New York. In addition, about half a dozen will be played in Brooklyn, while Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington are also on the Boston's visiting list for four concerts a season.

Pierre Monteux was conductor last year. It is generally conceded he did much to rehabilitate an organization practically shattered after Dr. Muck left America amid the frenzy of anti-German feeling which swept the country during the war days.

Koussevitzky came here touted as a miracle man, a super conductor, a genius whose like has never been seen in America. Consequently, when he appeared in New York last week for his debut most of the critics, by their own admission, were ready to pick flaws in plenty. Koussevitsky routed his critics and made the audience practically continue its ovation long after the last horn had sounded.

NEW YORK
MUSICAL AMERICA
DEC6 _1924

BUFFALO WELCOMES SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Resident Symphony Under Two Conductors Is Also Much Applauded

By F. W. Balch

BUFFALO, Nov. 29.—A welcome of especial cordiality was extended to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, on his initial appearance here on Nov. 13. It is difficult to recall when an audience has given such pronounced evidence of its enthusiasm as on this occasion. The concert was the second number in the Musical Arts given under Bessie Bellanca. The program included Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's D Major Concerto, orchestrated by Max Steinberg; Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the "Vocalise," by Rachmaninoff, "Dubinouchka," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the prelude to "Khovantchina," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," from "Tsar Saltan," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Buffalo Symphony opened its season in Elmwood Music Hall, on Nov. 16, before a capacity audience. Arnold Cornelissen, in the dual rôle of conductor and piano soloist, was much applauded, as was also Richard Hageman, guest conductor. Mr. Cornelissen's Concerto, dedicated to the Buffalo Chromatic Club, was a feature of the program. Under Mr. Hageman Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture was finely read. Mr. Cornelissen conducted Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the "Rienzi" Overture.

The city's newest musical enterprise, the First Settlement Music School, sponsored by the Buffalo Chromatic Club, by other organizations and resident musicians, was given a benefit in the Playhouse on Nov. 17. Lillian Woodward Street, reader; R. Leon Trick, pianist, and Helen Durrett, violinist, attracted a large audience. The First Settlement Music School will give lessons to pupils in moderate circumstances.

The Chromatic Club presented Amy Corey Fisher, pianist; Lillian Willcocks Ferris, soprano, and Franklin Riker, tenor, in an interesting concert in the Playhouse, on Nov. 15. Mrs. Ferris disclosed an attractive voice and met with a cordial reception. Mr. Riker showed interpretative skill. Mrs. Fisher was equally successful.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, drew a large audience to Elmwood Music Hall, Nov. 18. His own compositions were heard with particular pleasure and his mastery was in evidence in every number.

The American Artists' Club, of which A. A. Van De Mark is president and founder, opened its Wednesday dinner-musicales recently. Helen Garret Mennig, pianist; Hildred Morrow, soprano, and Ruth Pettit, contralto, were the artists, giving an attractive program. Mr. Van De Mark gave a brief address.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MUSICAL AMERICA
DEC6 _1924

Mrs. A. Lawrence Lowell, Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Edward Burlingame Hill, Mrs. Paul Sachs and Mrs. Edward W. Forbes were hostesses on Nov. 19 at the reception given in Paine Hall, Harvard music building, Cambridge, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Mrs. Koussevitzky. At the tea tables were Mrs. Arthur Pope, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mrs. A. K. Potter, Mrs. George Edgell, Mrs. Philip Spalding and Mrs. E. C. Moore.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
DEC6 1924

Hearty Welcome

Accorded Koussevitzky Upon His New York Debut---Huge Audience Taxed Capacity of Carnegie Hall

Ever since Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first concert of the current season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hub City concertgoers of New York have awaited with keen interest the coming of this brilliant conductor to New York. Further reports of the Boston concerts but served to increase this keen interest and the result is that the entire subscription series for the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is reported as being sold out. Thanksgiving Night was chosen for the debut appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky in New York and the huge audience which assembled taxed the capacity of Carnegie Hall to the extreme limits of the fire laws, and when the new conductor appeared on the platform he was greeted with an outburst of applause which continued for several minutes and certainly should have convinced him that New York was eager to welcome him. He chose as the opening number of the program, Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra which was given a most excellent reading and under his skillful guidance there was evidence this early in the evening of great improvement in the playing of the orchestra. Then followed Weber's overture to Oberon, which appears so often on orchestral programs that it has become tiresome to this writer, but, as played under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, assumed new beauty and every note was listened to with much interest and the audience, too, evidently greatly enjoyed it, as at its close the conductor was recalled to the platform repeatedly and the orchestra also shared with him the applause.

Two numbers by Debussy were given with a beauty of tone which made them stand out as one of the high lights of the concert. Next came Honneger's Pacific 231, which has been played several times before in the New York season, and this too received close attention from the audience and again there was long and loud applause. The concert was closed with Scriabin's Le Poeme de l'extase, in the directing of which the new conductor further proved his skill as a leader for he obtained tonal effects such as one has not heard from the Boston Orchestra in many seasons.

Altho one must needs hear other concerts directed by Mr. Koussevitzky before reaching a conclusion as to his ability, if this first concert is to be taken as a criterion, we prophesy that ere long the Philadelphia Orchestra and Mr. Stokowski will need to look to their laurels. We do not mean the Boston organization is at present in the same class with that of Philadelphia, but, in our estimation, it does surpass any of the New York ones, and given a few more months' work under Mr. Koussevitzky, we believe there is every possibility it may be a contender for first honors with the Philadelphia body, which organization at present, in our opinion, is the best orchestral body in this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. LEDGER
DEC 6 1924

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

For some reason or other New York has never had the best orchestral players. It never had a Longy; it had a Tabuteau and was not able to keep him. It never had a Kneisel, a Witck or a Thaddeus Rich as concertmeister; it never had an Anton Horner, or a Max Hess, although Jaenicke is more than pretty good. And the list might be prolonged indefinitely between the Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago orchestras. But, after all, the "firsts" of an orchestra, aside from the sensationalism of a few names (and it must be admitted, the work of some of the solo instruments) do not make a really great orchestra.

[illegible] Owing to the state of public opinion, an effort was made to graft French conductors upon an organization whose roots were wholly German.

There could be but one result and it happened with surprising thoroughness; the Boston Orchestra lost everything but the recollection of a glorious past; its Philadelphia concerts were abandoned because, according to the management, there were "too many demands for its services at home," and therefore some of the trips had to be canceled.

Really it was because with the kind of orchestral music that we were hearing from the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski, who by that time had started to make the organization the world's finest orchestra, the playing of the Bostonians no longer had box office attractions, despite its prestige; and the presence of a few of its best artists in the period of its greatest glory. Some of the performances given here under M. Rabaud and later M. Monteux were so ragged as to playing and so dubious as to interpretation as almost to suggest no rehearsals of the program and little understanding of the music.

The New York concerts, however, were continued, probably in the delusion, common in the country, that a New York success means a national triumph—which is not at all the case. But at any rate the New York concerts were maintained, but not with any great results from artistic or box office standards.

In the meantime, with this opportunity before it, New York failed to come to the front with an organization capable of taking the place of the Boston Orchestra with its trailing clouds of glory almost gathering the dust, so low were they. The Philadelphia Orchestra leaped into the breach and became the premier attraction of the famous "little old city"—you know the rest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MUSICAL AMERICA
[illegible]6 _1924

Koussevitzky Ill; Concertmaster Leads Concert in Brighton, Mass.

[By Telegraph to MUSICAL AMERICA]

BRIGHTON, MASS., Dec. 2.—Owing to the sudden indisposition of Serge Koussevitzky, the concert of the Boston Symphony on the evening of Dec. 1 was conducted by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Burgin gave an excellent account of himself in a difficult program. HENRY LEVINE.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 9 1924

IN NEW YORK

NEW YORK, Dec. 9.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Philadelphia Amuses

SAYS The Evening Ledger, one of Mr. Curtis's newspapers in Philadelphia: "To judge from the emotional emanations of certain New York musical specialists, as manifested in the large newspaper publications of that easily excited metropolis, New York is agog over the coming 'duello,' as the writers are pleased to term it, between the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras for supremacy in the large st ity in the country. Much speculation has been indulged in as to the relative merits of Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky, and to judge from the tone of some of the articles, the approval of New York is the ultimate end of the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras, and is to be sought even as, according to Scripture, a good name is to be desired rather than great riches.

"The orchestral situation has for decades been a sore point with New York. For a good many years the supremacy of the Boston Orchestra was admitted all over the United States. It had the best players and it had the best conductors. It was, at the time, the only orchestra in the country the directors of which did not have to indulge in a weekly scramble for the wherewithal to meet the expenses of the organization. On every side it was hailed as the greatest orchestra in the world, which at the time it undoubtedly was. New York, despite the temporary importation of Mengelberg, Safonov, Sir Henry Wood, Mahler (later permanent as was Safonov) and others of that impressive conductorial string, was unable to compete; for the simple reason that it did not have the players. Then, with the war, came the smash-up of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No one with any sense of musical justice will hesitate to admit that it was singularly complete. . . .

"The Philadelphia Orchestra has always been a peculiarly bitter pill for New York to swallow. It could make excuses for the supremacy of the Boston Symphony. It had adequate financial backing, hence it could get the best players and the best conductors. But when the Philadelphia Orchestra took the position formerly held by the Bostonians, none of these things held good. The Philadelphia Orchestra arose 'from the ranks,' and when the history of the organization is told, the struggles of the early years and the sacrifices of the men and women who repeatedly came to the rescue, will read like a fairy tale. But it was bitter truth at the time, as Mr. Van Rensselaer and the little group who stood firmly behind the organization in the days when it was a weekly question how the payroll would be raised, can testify. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why New York so cordially welcomes the 'coming struggle for supremacy' in the metropolis. But one fact remains: whatever the outcome, it will be an outside organization which will win. No New York orchestra has even a look-in, in spite of imported conductors, publicity and all the rest. . . .

"Of course there will be no 'struggle' between the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras. These organizations depend upon their own audiences for their support. But, if it pleases New York to consider the present orchestral season much as Spain would view a combat between a far-famed Andalusian bull and an invincible Madrid matador, by all means let it proceed. To paraphrase a sentence of Lawrence Gilman, anent the Koussevitzky-Monteux-Boston-New York situation it is 'conductorial flesh which is merely grass that may be turned into profitable hay at the box office.' Both organizations will draw capacity audiences in New York as they are doing in their own cities, but for a different reason.

"As matters stand at present, the Philadelphia Orchestra, in its personnel, is admittedly the best in the country, if not in the world. The upbuilding of the organization is the work of Mr. Stokowski. He found a good instrument when he came to Philadelphia in 1912, but he has since made it supreme. As New York has seen, from experience, the matter of orchestral supremacy lies in the orchestra fully as much as in the conductor. And to judge from the comment of thoroughly competent musicians, Philadelphia has little to fear from either conductorial or personnel standards."

This alleged "contest" in which the metropolis appears to be so deeply interested will be a good thing for music in America. It will stimulate the desire to emulate these great organizations all over the country and lead to the strengthening of symphony orchestras everywhere.

So, in the meantime, let the merry war progress. New York is intensely interested in the outcome, even if no other city is. And the verdict of New York is of immense importance—in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Sun

DEC 8 1924

Koussevitzky

On the platform of Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, stood a tall Russian. He had sparkling eyes, thin hands, greying hair, a tailor. He was Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making his Manhattan début. With uncommon dignity he turned his back on the notable company assembled in that hall, raised his arms. Rank on rank behind him stood, sat, lounged, the many who had come to see whether the Boston Symphony had any chance of regaining the haughty place it held before Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe under the Espionage act in 1917, whether it were true that this conductor was a "hypnotist," whether he could interpret Debussy, whether he wagged his head. They noted that he had a good back. They noted that every now and then, when he wanted to indicate a sudden pianissimo, he shot his left hand into the air, palm flat, in the way of one who hoists a heavy tray or thrusts a torch aloft. For the rest, his gestures were continent. He led Debussy's Nuages; Honegger's Pacific 231, Scriabin's Poem of Ecstacy. Like a storm of white hail came the clapping. With inexorable courtesy, Koussevitzky bowed and bowed.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He gained admission to the Moscow Conservatory by promising to study the double bass, an instrument much needed at the moment in the conservatory orchestra. Out of the belly of that bull fiddle he brought such music as no Russian, perhaps no other man, had ever brought before. When learning to conduct he grouped chairs about him in the positions players would occupy in actual performance, conducted voiceless symphonies, ghosts responding. He made his first appearance in Berlin, conducted with success in London, Paris, other European capitals. He came to the Boston Symphony to take the place of able Pierre Monteux.

* The Beethoven Association of New York was founded by Harold Bauer, pianist. Its members include many famed musical artists. Its purpose, in general, is to stimulate public interest in classical music, in particular to present the works of Beethoven in all forms, especially those least often heard. Large are its box-office receipts. These proceeds it has devoted to such good works as shall abet the fame of Beethoven, paying for the publication of Arthur Wheelock Thayer's Life of Beethoven in its first English version, contributing to the New York Public Library a valuable collection of works relating to the Master, giving a large sum toward the erection of a new Festspielhaus at Salzburg, Germany.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

DEC 8 1924

In New York

New York.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York' music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social pictur here since Dr Karl Muck became war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim handsome man and an impeccab dresser. In that respect he is muc like Stokowski. And those who ha followed the career of Stokows since his Cincinnati days will t you that his subjugation of au ences has been brought about much by his appearance as by musicianship.

New York has its own great ductors—Mengelburg, Van H Igor Stravinsky, the composer, straten, Hadley, Furtwangler the Philharmonic, and Damr Bruno Walter and Vladimir Go man with the Symphony. How the battle for the pinnacle of p favor seems to rest between the tors, Stokowski and Koussevitsk

And may the better pair of

PAPER—
Detroit News
DATE—
Dec 7

Boston Audiences Lead In Appreciating Music

But Philadelphia is Quicker on Trigger of Applause; Metropolitan Stands Out in New York.

This is the fourth of a series of articles on music in the East. Detroit, like other important American communities, is spending a considerable sum annually in an effort to satisfy its musical appetite and advance its general standards. This is symptomatic of the present day in the United States. The News instructed Mr. Player to visit all the important Eastern music centers, examine carefully the important orchestras, operatic organizations, civic ventures in music, educational work of a public character and so forth. Mr. Player visited particularly Boston, Philadelphia, Washington and New York. There will be articles on succeeding Sundays on the famous Bowery music settlement of New York, on the Metropolitan and on other subjects of like character and interest.

By CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.

IF the voice of the people is, as has been suggested, the voice of God; and if, as has also been suggested, good music is divine; then, things being equal to one another, music is the voice of the people.

There is an enchantment about great halls and a misty magic about great audiences which are alike difficult to capture and define. Walls are something more than a background for the human panorama, audiences more than a boxoffice fist. Would Stokowski or Damrosch perform as well, would their orchestras be what they are, if they played never to an audience other than the ghosts who glide somewhat discontentedly through all places of public performance? The fickleness and fixity of applause must annoy ghosts who once triumphed in it in the flesh and now perceive that it goes on immutably forever, regardless of changing identities.

Symphony Hall, of Boston, must have many notable ghosts, for not only has it its own inspiriting history of production, but it has embraced incomparable audiences. The best audience of the tour I found in Boston, the most enthusiastic in Philadelphia, the most brilliant in that brick temple on Broadway, the Metropolitan Opera House. But when it comes to appraising audiences as such, I find myself looking back to Boston and seeking there the standard for comparison.

Symphony Hall itself is coldly classical; its floors are noisy, their red carpet strips of covering honorably worn. It is a type of building much favored a generation ago in certain parts of Europe for the purposes of a Town Hall or meeting and exhibition place. Symphony Hall is the type at its best, and the severity of the environment is not in any sense inopportune or disturbing. It is, perhaps, what one expects, with its dull gold organ pipes behind the orchestra and the Archbishop of Boston stalking commonly in to emphasize the gravity of the occasion.

MR. PLAYER.

ALL ON TIME.

I have seen nowhere such an audience as this. I am willing to make oath, if required, that no more than three persons entered the main floor at the close of the overture; and the hall was filled. It was not a dressy audience, even for a matinee, as this was. Yet there was something carrying greater significance than clothes, a certain contained and reposeful air that belongs to gentle folk. Many among them looked as if they might have attended every concert throughout the entire 44 seasons of the orchestra's magnificent history. But all, youthful as well as middle-aged and elderly, formed an audience which, for interest and attentiveness, I have not seen matched. It was not the sophistication of the puzzling New York audiences, and yet it was an effect in culture, softened and heightened by the absence of the crepe which modern scepticism has nailed onto that expressive word.

In applause it was prompt but measured, and retained sufficient youth to unloose spontaneous approval of Koussevitzky's interpretation of the "Bacchanale" while drawing on its experience to modify its reception of the Roussel symphony. Nowhere did there seem evident any pedantic withholding of musical liberties, nor was there brazen enthusiasm for the sake of patriotism. Were I a professional musician of symphonic caliber, I would consider Boston the place before all others in which to play. It is so very much better than its reputation.

FEW BOBBED HEADS.

Neither in Boston nor in Philadelphia did I observe that strained and hunted look which is not uncommon to certain portions of many symphonic audiences. In Philadelphia my first amazement was that, as in Boston, there was virtually not a bobbed-hair Cecilia in the house. Yet there were women of, by any standard, charm and beauty. Bobbed hair has disappeared from the East's music audiences, if ever it existed there. The reason I was surprised at this discovery in Philadelphia was that here was a certain tangible exuberance, an audience ready to smile and not afraid to laugh, quicker on the trigger of applause than any similar audience and frankly, oh! most frankly, satisfied with the program offered them. Philadelphia preserves its youth.

The Academy of Music is another venerable building, which, like Boston's Symphony Hall, finds justification in its honorable age. After all, if such a building is elderly it is proof that music appreciation in the community also is well planted. The Academy's stage background I cared for not at all, and will not attempt to describe beyond saying that it is much worse even than Orchestra Hall's Victorian Peacock curtain. The auditorium itself, however, is solid and warm, the boxes are intimately disposed, and the whole audience seems brought together in cheerful and willing companionship. There is a precipitous incline leading to the parquet, smoothly carpeted, which provides a certain, desperate hazard to strangers. Of course, for a critic that doesn't matter much, since he works a typewriter with his arms and not with his legs.

AUDIENCES LARGE.

As at Boston, the audience was of capacity dimensions, and I understand it is a long day since the Philadelphia orchestra has played to less. One of the interesting things of the tour was the appearance of the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York on election night, when the audience again necessitated the S. R. O. sign.

W. H. Brennan, manager at Boston, and Arthur Judson at Philadelphia, where he is assisted by Louis A. Mattson, have staffs comparable in courtesy and affability to the inside staff at Detroit's Orchestra Hall. The friendliness of the attaches at the Academy of Music was particularly noticeable. Superficially, I should say this was the most marked difference between the human atmosphere enveloping concerts outside New York and that found within New York. Mr. Judson also manages the New York Philharmonic, being assisted there by D. Edward Porter. George Engles is manager of the New York Symphony. Josef Stransky apparently is his own manager for the State Orchestra.

The three New York orchestras use Carnegie, Aeolian Hall and, on Sunday afternoons, the Metropolitan Opera House. I heard all three in Carnegie Hall, as well as attending other concerts elsewhere. At Carnegie Hall it is not easy to differentiate between managements, but certainly both the Philharmonic and Symphony societies enjoy physical arrangements of high efficiency. One of the notable things about the large orchestral business organizations is the high character of the personnel and the effectiveness of administration.

To step from Boston and Philadelphia to New York is to leave the locality of personal contact and enter the metropolitan area of anonymity. There is nothing intimate about the New York audience, nothing familiar, nothing attractive. It is an audience which, in its individual elements, may be, and presumably is, much the same as another audience elsewhere; but gathered together in the bleak expanse of Carnegie Hall it is a dull and cold-eyed assembly, neutral in character, colorless to eye and mind.

MUCH WASTED SPACE.

What New York would do without Carnegie Hall I don't know. It seats few short of 3,000 in its main auditorium, which consists of a main floor and four shallow galleries, the lower two comprising boxes, the third a "dress circle," and the fourth either a plain balcony or a euphonious "family circle." Judged by modern standards, there is a vast amount of wasted space, and the acoustical properties, as in the Metropolitan Opera House, are variable. It is none-the-less an auditorium whose value to the metropolitan community is beyond computation. Its least attractive feature is the draughty and somewhat forbidding entrance, presided over by stiffly monotonous and not always good-tempered employes.

I have not seen Carnegie Hall filled for any concert, although I attended three there. I was told by a member of the audience that the Sunday house is frequently of capacity size. Considering the dimensions of the hall, the audiences for the Symphony and Philharmonic programs could be considered good ones, the boxes and two circles being well filled and the main floor holding a comfortable number, in spite of empty seats dotted over the floor.

FEW DRESS SUITS.

The audiences themselves were, in appearance, nondescript. The boxes contained an occasional dress suit, a few dinner suits and a dominant note in autumn business suits and tweeds. The main floor was similarly radical in its attitude toward sartorial convention. The whole audience, in each instance, seemed heterogenous, made up of unrelated units who found surprisingly little of that common emotional impulse usually found in a crowd so gathered. Feelings, having more means of vivid expression, run through any audience as a rule more readily than ideas. It is generally true that the intensifying of the feelings in consequence of reciprocal suggestion will be most rapid when the audience meets under agitating circumstances. Nowhere in the three programs, as it happened, were there the "agitating circumstances" so frequently found in music. The single moment of unanimity was discovered at the Symphony concert when Damrosch conducted the Honegger locomotive rhapsody, while to a certain extent Gabrilowitsch, playing a Schumann concerto, roused a psychologically reciprocal enthusiasm.

Both of these incidents, occurring at the same concert, seemed extravagant and abnormal in comparison with the low temperature prevailing for three almost successive nights at Carnegie Hall. Of course there are many demands on a New York audience and surfeit robs the auditor of the appetizing thrill belonging to isolated performances. Even so, the changing identity of the audience themselves seemed to indicate that not a single group of constant music-lovers, but a fluid and undirected ocean washed languidly against and into the various places of music attraction, with precisely the similarity and the unrecognizable anonymity of waves.

MONUMENT TO PAST.

The Metropolitan Opera House is another monument to past cultural aspiration. It was designed, I believe, by a cathedral architect, and has a crypt-like pillared sub-structure; from a practical point of view it is a reckless squanderer of street frontage. Its interior is heavy, tortuous and not always convenient. The auditorium itself is ornate, not equable in acoustics and contains many seats useless to the occupants so far as enjoying the opera itself is concerned. However, the most notable audiences of New York gather therein, and to it come annually pilgrims from every center of population in the country. On every occasion that I attended the opera the house was filled and many were standing.

During its Metropolitan season last May, Cleveland produced a series of brilliantly colorful audiences, but the setting of Public Hall is essentially democratic, while that of the Metropolitan Opera House is essentially aristocratic. The golden horseshoe is only one (though the chief) focusing feature which against a rich background, be[illegible] of raiment and glamor of [illegible] may be made visible to the [illegible] multitudes in humbler seats.

The Week's Music

TODAY.

Afternoon program of Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Marcia Lewis, soprano, and H. Matthias Turton, organist, as soloists; at Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

MONDAY.

John McCormack, tenor, in recital; at Arcadia Auditorium, 8:30 p. m.

TUESDAY.

Fall concert of Detroit Orpheus Club with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, as soloist; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THURSDAY.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance program; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

FRIDAY.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance program; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

SATURDAY.

Young People's Concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; at Orchestra Hall, 10:30 a. m.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance programs; at Orchestra Hall, 2:30 and 8:30 p. m.

SUNDAY.

Annual Christmas concert by Ypsilanti Normal Choir and Detroit Symphony Orchestra; at Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

"Andrea Chenier," by San Carlo Opera Company; at Shubert-Detroit Opera House, 8:15 p. m.

DECOROUS ENTHUSIASM.

Metropolitan audiences are decorously enthusiastic, the margin of excitement being touched by the fourth and fifth circles. Would Dante have numbered them upward or downward? Never mind. The third is the dress circle, the second is the grand tier box circle and the first or lower circle is the Horseshoe. But the audiences here have no need to distress themselves with applauding for that is taken care of by what seems to be an inrush of idle artists and other members of the company, who stand within the auditorium and back of the rails on either side of the house and pound their palms with noisy insistence long after the public interest has ceased. This is a most objectionable feature, a continental habit with which the Metropolitan well can dispense; one is surprised that the self-respect of the authorities does not put a stop to it.

It is a dizzy sight, during intermissions, to watch the pageantry of the promenade, the top-hatted men and the women arrayed in all the treasures brought from the corners of the earth for their adornment. At the fall of the final curtain sumptuous limousines with equally sumptuous attendants will roll their glistening carcases to the imposing doorways, and will bear away these irridescent birds of paradise to the massive castles on Park avenue and far out Fifth, leaving for the gaping visitor a sigh of envy, and a conviction that New York society women are a mighty fine looking lot while the society men are, on the contrary, prosaic to the point of viculty. The Metropolitan Opera House is the needle's eye of fashion and fortune.

THE STANDING LINE.

But observe, too, the waiting line patiently stiffening against the wintry evening for a matter of hours for the privilege of giving up a dollar (or is it two?) in return for standing room. For this America is of all sorts and conditions of men, and to them all does music speak a common language.

Here is the temple of a strange and mysterious adoration, whose outward symbol is stark wealth and a self-perpetuating aristocracy, and whose inward symbol is immortal, priceless gift of song. The world has worn a path to these doors, that eye and ear may be filled to grateful sufficiency with the wonders both of stage and audience. As a devotee remarked, with a reverent gesture towards the Horseshoe and a faltering of the knees: "It has been truly said that there, before your eyes, is assembled more WEALTH than at any other given point in the world."

And that, of course, is true; providing he was looking in the right direction.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT NEXT SATURDAY MORNING

The second of the series of Young People's Concerts will take place in Orchestra Hall next Saturday, Dec. 13, at 10:30 a. m. Miss Rhetts will lecture and illustrate her remarks with lantern slides. An orchestral program illustrative of the lecture will be played under Victor Kolar. The topic of the day will be "Compositions Influenced by Nationality [illegible]." The music will include Bizet's First Suite "L'Arlesienne" written to go with Alphonse Daudet's famous play of the same name; numbers by the Norwegian [illegible], "Heart Wounds" by Sibelius, "the dream panorama" from Hansel and Gretel by Humperdinck, and the Carnival Overture [illegible].

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Leme

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Philadelphia Amuses

SAYS The Evening Ledger, one of Mr. Curtis's newspapers in Philadelphia: "To judge from the emotional emanations of certain New York musical specialists, as manifested in the large newspaper publications of that easily excited metropolis, New York is agog over the coming 'duello,' as the writers are pleased to term it, between the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras for supremacy in the larg st ity in the country. Much speculation has been indulged in as to the relative merits of Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky, and to judge from the tone of some of the articles, the approval of New York is the ultimate end of the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras, and is to be sought even as, according to Scripture, a good name is to be desired rather than great riches.

"The orchestral situation has for decades been a sore point with New York. For a good many years the supremacy of the Boston Orchestra was admitted all over the United States. It had the best players and it had the best conductors. It was, at the time, the only orchestra in the country the directors of which did not have to indulge in a weekly scramble for the wherewithal to meet the expenses of the organization. On every side it was hailed as the greatest orchestra in the world, which at the time it undoubtedly was. New York, despite the temporary importation of Mengelberg, Safonov, Sir Henry Wood, Mahler (later permanent as was Safonov) and others of that impressive conductorial stripe, was unable to compete; for the simple reason that it did not have the players. Then, with the war, came the smash-up of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No one with any sense of musical justice will hesitate to admit that it was singularly complete. . . .

"The Philadelphia Orchestra has always been a peculiarly bitter pill for New York to swallow. It could make excuses for the supremacy of the Boston Symphony. It had adequate financial backing, hence it could get the best players and the best conductors. But when the Philadelphia Orchestra took the position formerly held by the Bostonians, none of these things held good. The Philadelphia Orchestra arose 'from the ranks,' and when the history of the organization is told, the struggles of the early years and the sacrifices of the men and women who repeatedly came to the rescue, will read like a fairy tale. But it was bitter truth at the time, as Mr. Van Rensselaer and the little group who stood firmly behind the organization in the days when it was a weekly question how the payroll would be raised, can testify. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why New York so cordially welcomes the 'coming struggle for supremacy' in the metropolis. But one fact remains: whatever the outcome, it will be an outside organization which will win. No New York orchestra has even a look-in, in spite of imported conductors, publicity and all the rest. . . .

"Of course there will be no 'struggle' between the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras. These organizations depend upon their own audiences for their support. But, if it pleases New York to consider the present orchestral season much as Spain would view a combat between a far-famed Andalusian bull and an invincible Madrid matador, by all means let it proceed. To paraphrase a sentence of Lawrence Gilman, anent the Koussevitzky-Monteux-Boston-New York situation it is 'conductorial flesh which is merely grass that may be turned into profitable hay at the box office.' Both organizations will draw capacity audiences in New York as they are doing in their own cities, but for a different reason.

"As matters stand at present, the Philadelphia Orchestra, in its personnel, is admittedly the best in the country, if not in the world. The upbuilding of the organization is the work of Mr. Stokowski. He found a good instrument when he came to Philadelphia in 1912, but he has since made it supreme. As New York has seen, from experience, the matter of orchestral supremacy lies in the orchestra fully as much as in the conductor. And to judge from the comment of thoroughly competent musicians, Philadelphia has little to fear from either conductorial or personnel standards."

This alleged "contest" in which the metropolis appears to be so deeply interested will be a good thing for music in America. It will stimulate the desire to emulate these great organizations all over the country and lead to the strengthening of symphony orchestras everywhere.

So, in the meantime, let the merry war progress. New York is intensely interested in the outcome, even if no other city is. And the verdict of New York is of immense importance—in New York.

DEC 8 1924

Koussevitzky

On the platform of Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, stood a tall Russian. He had sparkling eyes, thin hands, greying hair, a tailor. He was Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making his Manhattan début. With uncommon dignity he turned his back on the notable company assembled in that hall, raised his arms. Rank on rank behind him stood, sat, lounged, the many who had come to see whether the Boston Symphony had any chance of regaining the haughty place it held before Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe under the Espionage act in 1917, whether it were true that this conductor was a "hypnotist," whether he could interpret Debussy, whether he wagged his head. They noted that he had a good back. They noted that every now and then, when he wanted to indicate a sudden pianissimo, he shot his left hand into the air, palm flat, in the way of one who hoists a heavy tray or thrusts a torch aloft. For the rest, his gestures were continent. He led Debussy's Nuages; Honegger's Pacific 231, Scriabin's Poem of Ecstacy. Like a storm of white hail came the clapping. With inexorable courtesy, Koussevitzky bowed and bowed.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He gained admission to the Moscow Conservatory by promising to study the double bass, an instrument much needed at the moment in the conservatory orchestra. Out of the belly of that bull fiddle he brought such music as no Russian, perhaps no other man, had ever brought before. When learning to conduct he grouped chairs about him in the positions players would occupy in actual performance, conducted voiceless symphonies, ghosts responding. He made his first appearance in Berlin, conducted with success in London, Paris, other European capitals. He came to the Boston Symphony to take the place of able Pierre Monteux.

* The Beethoven Association of New York was founded by Harold Bauer, pianist. Its members include many famed musical artists. Its purpose, in general, is to stimulate public interest in classical music, in particular to present the works of Beethoven in all forms, especially those least often heard. Large are its box-office receipts. These proceeds it has devoted to such good works as shall abet the fame of Beethoven, paying for the publication of Arthur Wheelock Thayer's Life of Beethoven in its first English version, contributing to the New York Public Library a valuable collection of works relating to the Master, giving a large sum toward the erection of a new Festspielhaus at Salzburg, Germany.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 8 1924

In New York

New York.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Igor Stravinsky, the composer, Hadley, Furtwangler of the Philharmonic, and Damrosch. Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschmann with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of popular favor seems to rest between the two conductors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of

PAPER—
Detroit News
DATE—
Dec 7

Boston Audiences Lead In Appreciating Music

But Philadelphia is Quicker on Trigger of Applause; Metropolitan Stands Out in New York.

This is the fourth of a series of articles on music in the East. Detroit, like other important American communities, is spending a considerable sum annually in an effort to satisfy its musical appetite and advance its general standards. This is symptomatic of the present day in the United States. The News instructed Mr. Player to visit all the important Eastern music centers, examine carefully the important orchestras, operatic organizations, civic ventures in music, educational work of a public character and so forth. Mr. Player visited particularly Boston, Philadelphia, Washington and New York. There will be articles on succeeding Sundays on the famous Bowery music settlement of New York, on the Metropolitan and on other subjects of like character and interest.

By CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.

IF the voice of the people is, as has been suggested, the voice of God; and if, as has also been suggested, good music is divine; then, things being equal to one another, music is the voice of the people.

There is an enchantment about great halls and a misty magic about great audiences which are alike difficult to capture and define. Walls are something more than a background for the human panorama, audiences more than a boxoffice list. Would Stokowski or Damrosch perform as well, would their orchestras be what they are, if they played never to an audience other than the ghosts who glide somewhat discontentedly through all places of public performance? The fickleness and fixity of applause must annoy ghosts who once triumphed in it in the flesh and now perceive that it goes on immutably forever, regardless of changing identities.

Symphony Hall, of Boston, must have many notable ghosts, for not only has it its own inspiriting history of production, but it has embraced incomparable audiences. The best audience of the tour I found in Boston, the most enthusiastic in Philadelphia, the most brilliant in that brick temple on Broadway, the Metropolitan Opera House. But when it comes to appraising audiences as such, I find myself looking back to Boston and seeking there the standard for comparison.

Symphony Hall itself is coldly classical; its floors are noisy, their red carpet strips of covering honorably worn. It is a type of building much favored a generation ago in certain parts of Europe for the purposes of a Town Hall or meeting and exhibition place. Symphony Hall is the type at its best, and the severity of the environment is not in any sense inopportune or disturbing. It is, perhaps, what one expects, with its dull gold organ pipes behind the orchestra, and the Archbishop of Boston stalking commonly in to emphasize the gravity of the occasion.

MR. PLAYER.

ALL ON TIME.

I have seen nowhere such an audience as this. I am willing to make oath, if required, that no more than three persons entered the main floor at the close of the overture; and the hall was filled. It was not a dressy audience, even for a matinee, as this was. Yet there was something carrying greater significance than clothes, a certain contained and reposeful air that belongs to gentle folk. Many among them looked as if they might have attended every concert throughout the entire 44 seasons of the orchestra's magnificent history. But all, youthful as well as middle-aged and elderly, formed an audience which, for interest and attentiveness, I have not seen matched. It was not the sophistication of the puzzling New York audiences, and yet it was an effect in culture, softened and heightened by the absence of the crepe which modern scepticism has nailed onto that expressive word.

In applause it was prompt but measured, and retained sufficient youth to unloose spontaneous approval of Koussevitzky's interpretation of the "Bacchanale" while drawing on its experience to modify its reception of the Roussel symphony. Nowhere did there seem evident any pedantic withholding of musical liberties, nor was there brazen enthusiasm for the sake of patriotism. Were I a professional musician of symphonic caliber, I would consider Boston the place before all others in which to play. It is so very much better than its reputation.

FEW BOBBED HEADS.

Neither in Boston nor in Philadelphia did I observe that strained and hunted look which is not uncommon to certain portions of many symphonic audiences. In Philadelphia my first amazement was that, as in Boston, there was virtually not a bobbed-hair Cecilia in the house. Yet there were women of, by any standard, charm and beauty. Bobbed hair has disappeared from the East's music audiences, if ever it existed there. The reason I was surprised at this discovery in Philadelphia was that here was a certain tangible exuberance, an audience ready to smile and not afraid to laugh, quicker on the trigger of applause than any similar audience and frankly, oh! most frankly, satisfied with the program offered them. Philadelphia preserves its youth.

The Academy of Music is another venerable building, which, like Boston's Symphony Hall, finds justification in its honorable age. After all, if such a building is elderly it is proof that music appreciation in the community also is well planted. The Academy's stage background I cared for not at all, and will not attempt to describe beyond saying that it is much worse even than Orchestra Hall's Victorian Peacock curtain. The auditorium itself, however, is solid and warm, the boxes are intimately disposed, and the whole audience seems brought together in cheerful and willing companionship. There is a precipitous incline leading to the parquet, smoothly carpeted, which provides a certain desperate hazard to strangers. Of course, for a critic that doesn't matter much, since he works a typewriter with his arms and not with his legs.

AUDIENCES LARGE.

As at Boston, the audience was of capacity dimensions, and I understand it is a long day since the Philadelphia orchestra has played to less. One of the interesting things of the tour was the appearance of the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York on election night, when the audience again necessitated the S. R. O. sign.

W. H. Brennan, manager at Boston, and Arthur Judson at Philadelphia, where he is assisted by Louis A. Mattson, have staffs comparable in courtesy and affability to the inside staff at Detroit's Orchestra Hall. The friendliness of the attaches at the Academy of Music was particularly noticeable. Superficially, I should say this was the most marked difference between the human atmosphere enveloping concerts outside New York and that found within New York. Mr. Judson also manages the New York Philharmonic, being assisted there by D. Edward Porter. George Engles is manager of the New York Symphony. Josef Stransky apparently is his own manager for the State Orchestra.

The three New York orchestras use Carnegie, Aeolian Hall and, on Sunday afternoons, the Metropolitan Opera House. I heard all three in Carnegie Hall, as well as attending other concerts elsewhere. At Carnegie Hall it is not easy to differentiate between managements, but certainly both the Philharmonic and Symphony societies enjoy physical arrangements of high efficiency. One of the notable things about the large orchestral business organizations is the high character of the personnel and the effectiveness of administration.

To step from Boston and Philadelphia to New York is to leave the locality of personal contact and enter the metropolitan area of anonymity. There is nothing intimate about the New York audience, nothing familiar, nothing attractive. It is an audience which, in its individual elements, may be, and presumably is, much the same as another audience elsewhere; but gathered together in the bleak expanse of Carnegie Hall it is a dull and cold-eyed assembly, neutral in character, colorless to eye and mind.

MUCH WASTED SPACE.

What New York would do without Carnegie Hall I don't know. It seats few short of 3,000 in its main auditorium, which consists of a main floor and four shallow galleries, the lower two comprising boxes, the third a "dress circle," and the fourth either a plain balcony or a euphonious "family circle." Judged by modern standards, there is a vast amount of wasted space, and the acoustical properties, as in the Metropolitan Opera House, are variable. It is none-the-less an auditorium whose value to the metropolitan community is beyond computation. Its least attractive feature is the draughty and somewhat forbidding entrance, presided over by stiffly monotonous and not always good-tempered employes.

I have not seen Carnegie Hall filled for any concert, although I attended three there. I was told by a member of the audience that the Sunday house is frequently of capacity size. Considering the dimensions of the hall, the audiences for the Symphony and Philharmonic programs could be considered good ones, the boxes and two circles being well filled and the main floor holding a comfortable number, in spite of empty seats dotted over the floor.

FEW DRESS SUITS.

The audiences themselves were, in appearance, nondescript. The boxes contained an occasional dress suit, a few dinner suits and a dominant note in autumn business suits and tweeds. The main floor was similarly radical in its attitude toward sartorial convention. The whole audience, in each instance, seemed heterogenous, made up of unrelated units who found surprisingly little of that common emotional impulse usually found in a crowd so gathered. Feelings, having more means of vivid expression, run through any audience as a rule more readily than ideas. It is generally true that the intensifying of the feelings in consequence of reciprocal suggestion will be most rapid when the audience meets under agitating circumstances. Nowhere in the three programs, as it happened, were there the "agitating circumstances" so frequently found in music. The single moment of unanimity was discovered at the Symphony concert when Damrosch conducted the Honegger locomotive rhapsody, while to a certain extent Gabrilowitsch, playing a Schumann concerto, roused a psychologically reciprocal enthusiasm.

Both of these incidents, occurring at the same concert, seemed extravagant and abnormal in comparison with the low temperature prevailing for three almost successive nights at Carnegie Hall. Of course there are many demands on a New York audience and surfeit robs the auditor of the appetizing thrill belonging to isolated performances. Even so, the changing identity of the audience themselves seemed to indicate that not a single group of constant music-lovers, but a fluid and undirected ocean washed languidly against and into the various places of music attraction, with precisely the similarity and the unrecognizable anonymity of waves.

MONUMENT TO PAST.

The Metropolitan Opera House is another monument to past cultural aspiration. It was designed, I believe, by a cathedral architect, and has a crypt-like pillared sub-structure; from a practical point of view it is a reckless squanderer of street frontage. Its interior is heavy, tortuous and not always convenient. The auditorium itself is ornate, not equable in acoustics and contains many seats useless to the occupants so far as enjoying the opera itself is concerned. However, the most notable audiences of New York gather therein, and to it come annually pilgrims from every center of population in the country. On every occasion that I attended the opera the house was filled and many were standing.

During its Metropolitan season last May, Cleveland produced a series of brilliantly colorful audiences, but the setting of Public Hall is essentially democratic, while that of the Metropolitan Opera House is essentially aristocratic. The golden horseshoe is only one (though the chief) focusing feature where, against a rich background, beauty of raiment and glamor of wealth may be made visible to the envious multitudes in humbler seats. One of the striking things about the Horseshoe and its 35 throne-boxes was the casualness of its inhabitants towards the performance. On the night Jeritza sang in Lohengrin only a handful of the parterre boxes were occupied at the rise of the curtain and comparatively few when the final curtain fell; but in the middle of the opera the Horseshoe was virtually filled to repletion with a gorgeous and effective audience.

DECOROUS ENTHUSIASM.

Metropolitan audiences are decorously enthusiastic, the margin of excitement being touched by the fourth and fifth circles. Would Dante have numbered them upward or downward? Never mind. The third is the dress circle, the second is the grand tier box circle and the first or lower circle is the Horseshoe. But the audiences here have no need to distress themselves with applauding for that is taken care of by what seems to be an inrush of idle artists and other members of the company, who stand within the auditorium and back of the rails on either side of the house and pound their palms with noisy insistence long after the public interest has ceased. This is a most objectionable feature, a continental habit with which the Metropolitan well can dispense; one is surprised that the self-respect of the authorities does not put a stop to it.

It is a dizzy sight, during intermissions, to watch the pageantry of the promenade, the top-hatted men and the women arrayed in all the treasures brought from the corners of the earth for their adornment. At the fall of the final curtain sumptuous limousines with equally sumptuous attendants will roll their glistening carcases to the imposing doorways, and will bear away these irridescent birds of paradise to the massive castles on Park avenue and far out Fifth, leaving for the gaping visitor a sigh of envy, and a conviction that New York society women are a mighty fine looking lot while the society men are, on the contrary, prosaic to the point of vacuity. The Metropolitan Opera House is the needle's eye of fashion and fortune.

THE STANDING LINE.

But observe, too, the waiting line patiently stiffening against the wintry evening for a matter of hours for the privilege of giving up a dollar (or is it two?) in return for standing room. For this America is of all sorts and conditions of men, and to them all does music speak a common language.

Here is the temple of a strange and mysterious adoration, whose outward symbol is stark wealth and a self-perpetuating aristocracy, and whose inward symbol is immortal, priceless gift of song. The world has worn a path to these doors, that eye and ear may be filled to grateful sufficiency with the wonders both of stage and audience. As a devotee remarked, with a reverent gesture towards the Horseshoe and a faltering of the knees: "It has been truly said that there, before your eyes, is assembled more WEALTH than at any other given point in the world."

And that, of course, is true; providing he was looking in the right direction.

The Week's Music

TODAY.

Afternoon program of Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Marcia Lewis, soprano, and H. Mathias Turton, organist, as soloists; at Orchestra Hall. 3:30 p. m.

MONDAY.

John McCormack, tenor, in recital; at Arcadia Auditorium, 8:30 p. m.

TUESDAY.

Fall concert of Detroit Orpheus Club with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, as soloist; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THURSDAY.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance program; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

FRIDAY.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance program; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

SATURDAY.

Young People's Concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; at Orchestra Hall, 10:30 a. m.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance programs; at Orchestra Hall, 2:30 and 8:30 p. m

SUNDAY.

Annual Christmas concert by Ypsilanti Normal Choir and Detroit Symphony Orchestra; at Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

"Andrea Chenier," by San Carlo Opera Company; at Shubert-Detroit Opera House, 8:15 p. m.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT NEXT SATURDAY MORNING

The second of the series of Young People's Concerts will take place in Orchestra Hall next Saturday, Dec. 13, at 10:30 a. m. Miss Rhetts will lecture and illustrate her remarks with lantern slides. An orchestral program illustrative of the lecture will be played under Victor Kolar. The topic of the day will be "Compositions Influenced by Nationality of Composer." The music will include Bizet's First Suite "L'Arlesienne," written to go with Alphonse Daudet's famous play of the same name; two pieces by the Norwegian composer, Grieg, "Heart Wounds" and "In Spring;" the dream pantomime from "Hansel and Gretel," and, finally, the Carnival. Overture of Dvorak.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Times

PAPER-
Detroit News
DATE-
Dec. 7

Boston Audiences Lead In Appreciating Music

But Philadelphia is Quicker on Trigger of Applause; Metropolitan Stands Out in New York.

This is the fourth of a series of articles on music in the East. Detroit, like other important American communities, is spending a considerable sum annually in an effort to satisfy its musical appetite and advance its general standards. This is symptomatic of the present day in the United States. The News instructed Mr. Player to visit all the important Eastern music centers, examine carefully the important orchestras, operatic organizations, civic ventures in music, educational work of a public character and so forth. Mr. Player visited particularly Boston, Philadelphia, Washington and New York. There will be articles on succeeding Sundays on the famous Bowery music settlement of New York, on the Metropolitan and on other subjects of like character and interest.

By CYRIL ARTHUR PLAYER.

IF the voice of the people is, as has been suggested, the voice of God; and if, as has also been suggested, good music is divine; then, things being equal to one another, music is the voice of the people.

There is an enchantment about great halls and a misty magic about great audiences which are alike difficult to capture and define. Walls are something more than a background for the human panorama, audiences more than a boxoffice list. Would Stokowski or Damrosch perform as well, would their orchestras be what they are, if they played never to an audience other than the ghosts who glide somewhat discontentedly through all places of public performance? The fickleness and fixity of applause must annoy ghosts who

The Week's Music

TODAY.

Afternoon program of Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Marcia Lewis, soprano, and H. Matthias Turton, organist, as soloists; at Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

MONDAY.

John McCormack, tenor, in recital; at Arcadia Auditorium, 8:30 p. m.

TUESDAY.

Fall concert of Detroit Orpheus Club with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, as soloist; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THURSDAY.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance program; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

FRIDAY.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance program; at Orchestra Hall, 8:30 p. m.

SATURDAY.

Young People's Concert by Detroit Symphony Orchestra; at Orchestra Hall, 10:30 a. m.

Anna Pavlowa and ballet in dance programs; at Orchestra Hall, 2:30 and 8:30 p. m.

SUNDAY.

Annual Christmas concert by Ypsilanti Normal Choir and Detroit Symphony Orchestra; at Orchestra Hall, 3:30 p. m.

"Andrea Chenier," by San Carlo Opera Company; at Shubert-Detroit Opera House, 8:15 p. m.

Sunday afternoons, the Metropolitan Opera House. I heard all three in Carnegie Hall, as well as attending other concerts elsewhere. At Carnegie Hall it is not easy to differentiate between managements, but certainly both the Philharmonic and Symphony societies enjoy physical arrangements of high efficiency. One of the notable things about the large orchestral business organizations is the high character of the personnel and the effectiveness of administration.

To step from Boston and Philadelphia to New York is to leave the locality of personal contact and enter the metropolitan area of anonymity. There is nothing intimate about the New York audience, nothing familiar, nothing attractive. It is an audience which, in its individual elements, may be, and presumably is, much the same as another audience elsewhere; but gathered together in the bleak expanse of Carnegie Hall it is a dull and cold-eyed assembly, neutral in character, colorless to eye and mind.

MUCH WASTED SPACE.

What New York would do without Carnegie Hall I don't know. It seats few short of 3,000 in its main auditorium, which consists of a main floor and four shallow galleries, the lower two comprising boxes, the third a "dress circle," and the fourth either a plain balcony or a euphonious "family circle." Judged by modern standards, there is a vast amount of wasted space, and the acoustical properties, as in the Metropolitan Opera House, are variable. It is none-the-less an auditorium whose value to the metropolitan community is beyond computation. Its least attractive feature is the draughty and somewhat forbidding entrance, presided over by stiffly monotonous and not always good-tempered employes.

I have not seen Carnegie Hall filled for any concert, although I attended three there. I was told by a member of the audience that the Sunday house is frequently of capacity size. Considering the dimensions of the hall, the audiences for the Symphony and Philharmonic programs could be considered good ones, the boxes and two circles being well filled and the main floor holding a comfortable number, in spite of empty seats dotted over the floor.

FEW DRESS SUITS.

The audiences themselves were, in appearance, nondescript. The boxes contained an occasional dress suit, a few dinner suits and a dominant note in autumn business suits and tweeds. The main floor was similarly radical in its attitude toward sartorial convention. The whole audience, in each instance, seemed heterogenous, made up of unrelated units who found surprisingly little of that common emotional impulse usually found in a crowd so gathered. Feelings, having more means of vivid expression, run through any audience as a rule more readily than ideas. It is generally true that the intensifying of the feelings in consequence of reciprocal suggestion will be most rapid when the audience meets under agitating circumstances. Nowhere in the three programs, as it happened, were there the "agitating circumstances" so frequently found in music. The single moment of unanimity was discovered at the Symphony concert when Damrosch conducted the Honegger locomotive rhapsody, while to a certain extent Gabrilowitsch, playing a Schumann concerto, roused a psychologically reciprocal enthusiasm.

Both of these incidents, occurring at the same concert, seemed extravagant and abnormal in comparison with the low temperature prevailing for three almost successive nights at Carnegie Hall. Of course there are many demands on a New York audience and surfeit robs the auditor of the appetizing thrill belonging to isolated performances. Even so, the changing identity of the audience themselves seemed to indicate that not a single group of constant music-lovers, but a fluid and undirected ocean washed languidly against and into the various places of music attraction, with precisely the similarity and the unrecognizable anonymity of waves.

MONUMENT TO PAST.

The Metropolitan Opera House is another monument to past cultural aspiration. It was designed, I believe, by a cathedral architect, and has a crypt-like pillared sub-structure; from a practical point of view it is a reckless squanderer of street frontage. Its interior is heavy, tortuous and not always convenient. The auditorium itself is ornate, not equable in acoustics and contains many seats useless to the occupants so far as enjoying the opera itself is concerned. However, the most notable audiences of New York gather therein, and to it come annually pilgrims from every center of population in the country. On every occasion that I attended the opera the house was filled and many were standing.

During its Metropolitan season last May, Cleveland produced a series of brilliantly colorful audiences, but the setting of Public Hall is essentially democratic, while that of the Metropolitan Opera House is essentially aristocratic. The golden horseshoe is only one (though the chief) focusing feature where, against a rich background, beauty of raiment and glamor of wealth may be made visible to the envious multitudes in humbler seats. One of the striking things about the Horseshoe and its 35 throne-boxes was the casualness of its inhabitants towards the performance. On the night Jeritza sang in Lohengrin only a handful of the parterre boxes were occupied at the rise of the curtain and comparatively few when the final curtain fell; but in the middle of the opera the Horseshoe was virtually filled to repletion with a gorgeous and effective audience.

DECOROUS ENTHUSIASM.

Metropolitan audiences are decorously enthusiastic, the margin of excitement being touched by the fourth and fifth circles. Would Dante have numbered them upward or downward? Never mind. The third is the dress circle, the second is the grand tier box circle and the first or lower circle is the Horseshoe. But the audiences here have no need to distress themselves with applauding for that is taken care of by what seems to be an inrush of idle artists and other members of the company, who stand within the auditorium and back of the rails on either side of the house and pound their palms with noisy insistence long after the public interest has ceased. This is a most objectionable feature, a continental habit with which the Metropolitan well can dispense; one is surprised that the self-respect of the authorities does not put a stop to it.

It is a dizzy sight, during intermissions, to watch the pageantry of the promenade, the top-hatted men and the women arrayed in all the treasures brought from the corners of the earth for their adornment. At the fall of the final curtain sumptuous limousines with equally sumptuous attendants will roll their glistening carcases to the imposing doorways, and will bear away these irridescent birds of paradise to the massive castles on Park avenue and far out Fifth, leaving for the gaping visitor a sigh of envy, and a conviction that New York society women are a mighty fine looking lot while the society men are, on the contrary, prosaic to the point of vacuity. The Metropolitan Opera House is the needle's eye of fashion and fortune.

THE STANDING LINE.

But observe, too, the waiting line patiently stiffening against the wintry evening for a matter of hours for the privilege of giving up a dollar (or is it two?) in return for standing room. For this America is of all sorts and conditions of men, and to them all does music speak a common language.

Here is the temple of a strange and mysterious adoration, whose outward symbol is stark wealth and a self-perpetuating aristocracy, and whose inward symbol is immortal, priceless gift of song. The world has worn a path to these doors, that eye and ear may be filled to grateful sufficiency with the wonders both of stage and audience. As a devotee remarked, with a reverent gesture towards the Horseshoe and a faltering of the knees: "It has been truly said that there, before your eyes, is assembled more WEALTH than at any other given point in the world."

And that, of course, is true; providing he was looking in the right direction.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT NEXT SATURDAY MORNING

The second of the series of Young People's Concerts will take place in Orchestra Hall next Saturday, Dec. 13, at 10:30 a. m. Miss Rhetts will lecture and illustrate her remarks with lantern slides. An orchestral program illustrative of the lecture will be played under Victor Kolar. The topic of the day will be "Compositions Influenced by Nationality of Composer." The music will include Bizet's First Suite "L'Arlesienne," written to go with Alphonse Daudet's famous play of the same name; two pieces by the Norwegian composer, Grieg, "Heart Wounds" and "In Spring," the dream pantomime from "Hansel and Gretel," and, finally, the Carnival. Overture of Dvorak.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Philadelphia Amuses

SAYS The Evening Ledger, one of Mr. Curtis's newspapers in Philadelphia: "To judge from the emotional emanations of certain New York musical specialists, as manifested in the large newspaper publications of that easily excited metropolis, New York is agog over the coming 'duello,' as the writers are pleased to term it, between the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras for supremacy in the larg st ity in the country. Much speculation has been indulged in as to the relative merits of Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky, and to judge from the tone of some of the articles, the approval of New York is the ultimate end of the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras, and is to be sought even as, according to Scripture, a good name is to be desired rather than great riches.

"The orchestral situation has for decades been a sore point with New York. For a good many years the supremacy of the Boston Orchestra was admitted all over the United States. It had the best players and it had the best conductors. It was, at the time, the only orchestra in the country the directors of which did not have to indulge in a weekly scramble for the wherewithal to meet the expenses of the organization. On every side it was hailed as the greatest orchestra in the world, which at the time it undoubtedly was. New York, despite the temporary importation of Mengelberg, Safonov, Sir Henry Wood, Mahler (later permanent as was Safonov) and others of that impressive conductorial strine, was unable to compete; for the simple reason that it did not have the players. Then, with the war, came the smash-up of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. No one with any sense of musical justice will hesitate to admit that it was singularly complete. . . .

"The Philadelphia Orchestra has always been a peculiarly bitter pill for New York to swallow. It could make excuses for the supremacy of the Boston Symphony. It had adequate financial backing, hence it could get the best players and the best conductors. But when the Philadelphia Orchestra took the position formerly held by the Bostonians, none of these things held good. The Philadelphia Orchestra arose 'from the ranks,' and when the history of the organization is told, the struggles of the early years and the sacrifices of the men and women who repeatedly came to the rescue, will read like a fairy tale. But it was bitter truth at the time, as Mr. Van Rensselaer and the little group who stood firmly behind the organization in the days when it was a weekly question how the payroll would be raised, can testify. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why New York so cordially welcomes the 'coming struggle for supremacy' in the metropolis. But one fact remains: whatever the outcome, it will be an outside organization which will win. No New York orchestra has even a look-in, in spite of imported conductors, publicity and all the rest. . . .

"Of course there will be no 'struggle' between the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras. These organizations depend upon their own audiences for their support. But, if it pleases New York to consider the present orchestral season much as Spain would view a combat between a far-famed Andalusian bull and an invincible Madrid matador, by all means let it proceed. To paraphrase a sentence of Lawrence Gilman, anent the Koussevitzky-Monteux-Boston-New York situation it is 'conductorial flesh which is merely grass that may be turned into profitable hay at the box office.' Both organizations will drew capacity audiences in New York as they are doing in their own cities, but for a different reason.

"As matters stand at present, the Philadelphia Orchestra, in its personnel, is admittedly the best in the country, if not in the world. The upbuilding of the organization is the work of Mr. Stokowski. He found a good instrument when he came to Philadelphia in 1912, but he has since made it supreme. As New York has seen, from experience, the matter of orchestral supremacy lies in the orchestra fully as much as in the conductor. And to judge from the comment of thoroughly competent musicians, Philadelphia has little to fear from either conductorial or personnel standards."

This alleged "contest" in which the metropolis appears to be so deeply interested will be a good thing for music in America. It will stimulate the desire to emulate these great organizations all over the country and lead to the strengthening of symphony orchestras everywhere.

So, in the meantime, let the merry war progress. New York is intensely interested in the outcome, even if no other city is. And the verdict of New York is of immense importance—in New York.

DEC 8 1924

Koussevitzky

On the platform of Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, stood a tall Russian. He had sparkling eyes, thin hands, greying hair, a tailor. He was Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making his Manhattan début. With uncommon dignity he turned his back on the notable company assembled in that hall, raised his arms. Rank on rank behind him stood, sat, lounged, the many who had come to see whether the Boston Symphony had any chance of regaining the haughty place it held before Dr. Karl Muck went to Fort Oglethorpe under the Espionage act in 1917, whether it were true that this conductor was a "hypnotist," whether he could interpret Debussy, whether he wagged his head. They noted that he had a good back. They noted that every now and then, when he wanted to indicate a sudden pianissimo, he shot his left hand into the air, palm flat, in the way of one who hoists a heavy tray or thrusts a torch aloft. For the rest, his gestures were continent. He led Debussy's Nuages; Honegger's Pacific 231, Scriabin's Poem of Ecstacy. Like a storm of white hail came the clapping. With inexorable courtesy, Koussevitzky bowed and bowed.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in Vyshny Volotchk, Russia. He gained admission to the Moscow Conservatory by promising to study the double bass, an instrument much needed at the moment in the conservatory orchestra. Out of the belly of that bull fiddle he brought such music as no Russian, perhaps no other man, had ever brought before. When learning to conduct he grouped chairs about him in the positions players would occupy in actual performance, conducted voiceless symphonies, ghosts responding. He made his first appearance in Berlin, conducted with success in London, Paris, other European capitals. He came to the Boston Symphony to take the place of able Pierre Monteux.

* The Beethoven Association of New York was founded by Harold Bauer, pianist. Its members include many famed musical artists. Its purpose, in general, is to stimulate public interest in classical music, in particular to present the works of Beethoven in all forms, especially those least often heard. Large are its box-office receipts. These proceeds it has devoted to such good works as shall abet the fame of Beethoven, paying for the publication of Arthur Wheelock Thayer's Life of Beethoven in its first English version, contributing to the New York Public Library a valuable collection of works relating to the Master, giving a large sum toward the erection of a new Festspielhaus at Salzburg, Germany.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 8 1924

In New York

New York.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the Symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

224

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 11 1924

SYMPHONY SEATS ALL BOUGHT UP

Not a Ticket Left for Boston or New York Season

For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not a ticket to sell, either for its regular concerts in Boston or, for that ma for the double series in New Yor In other words, the 24 concerts on Friday afternoons, the 24 concerts on Saturday evenings and the additional series of five concerts on Monday evenings are now "sold out" for the season.

FRIDAY "RUSH" SEATS

As exception to the foregoing sweeping statement it should be noted that there remain the Young People's Concerts (for those who are eligible) and the two concerts in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, for which no tickets are sold by subscription. And the Friday afternoon "ruch" is still in force, for rather than abandon this time-honored institution the trustees of the orchestra still offer, at a nominal charge of 50 cents, the 501 seats of the second balcony for these Friday concerts, although that these seats could be sold by subscription at a far greater profit to the orchestra goes without saying.

The explanation of the present unprecedented state of affairs may be given in one word: Koussevitzky.

Everything Taken

Before ever the magnetic Russian ad lifted a baton in this city the demand for season tickets had already xceeded all records, so great was the uriosity to hear (and to see) him, and when the first few concerts of the season had established beyond any disputing the fact that Koussevitzky was conductor of positive genius—no mere sensation-monger but an extraordinarily revealing interpreter of the composers of every school—then whatever seats were still available for subscription were disposed of forthwith.

And since it is human nature to crave the unobtainable these holders of season tickets have today become the envy of those who have them not, even of those who in the past gave to the symphony concerts barely a passing thought. Wherefore it behooves those fortunate ones who are the owners of season tickets to take care that they never go unused. What greater courtesy could be extended to the stranger within our gates than to present him with a ticket for a symphony concert?

Length of Stay Uncertain

How long Koussevitzky will remain among us is not certain; at least those in authority make no definite statement concerning the length of his engagement. But in any event he is ours for the present, while if the people of Boston retain their eagerness to hear the orchestra under his direction it is not unreasonable to suppose that the number of concerts here may be increased, though it was not long ago that the Monday series would have been deemed an experiment too risky to be undertaken.

But to avoid misunderstanding the trustees would have it added that a fly still lingers in the ointment of the present happy situation. Even with every seat for every concert sold, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not self-supporting. To make it so, with the existing scale of salaries, would mean to raise materially the price of tickets, and that might bring justifiable protest. Hence public support, over and above the buying of tickets, is still essential to the orchestra's existence, although on good authority it is said that our orchestra more nearly approaches the ideal state of complete self-dependence than does that of any other city of America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 11 1924

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Up to the present time Mr. Koussevitzky with the invaluable aid of the orchestra bequeathed to him has been the soloist at the Symphony concerts. This week a pianist will play, one Alexander Borovsky, who was born at Libau in 1889. He was taught at first by his mother, a pupil of Safonov, once the conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, and in Leningrad by Annette Essipov, the beautiful woman who delighted Americans by her playing, and also Leschetitzky, for she was one of his wives, the second in order—there were four in turn, and the fourth, a pianist, is now in this country. Mr. Borovsky was awarded the gold medal and the Rubinstein prize. In 1915 he taught at the Moscow Conservatory. He has played in European cities, going to Paris by way of Constantinople in 1920. In Paris he gave concerts with a violoncellist and played at one of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts in 1921. He has visited South America, and last season he made his first appearance in New York. Our memory is hazy with respect to pianists of formidable names; they come, they go, or they do not come; we have a vague remembrance of Mr. Borovsky being announced as coming last season and then a cancellation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ST. PETERSBURG FLA.
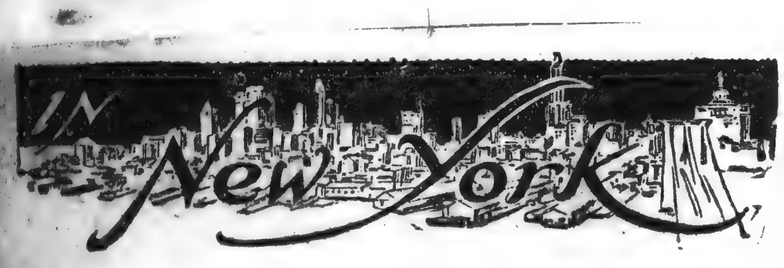
INDEPENDENT
DEC 11 1924



New York, Dec. 11.—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors — Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter, and Vladimir Gloschman with the Sympohny. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS SUNDAY

At the pension fund concert to be given next Sunday afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky will make his first bow to the public outside of the regular Symphony concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky

The new Symphony conductor, who has been hailed in Boston and New York as one of the most brilliant personalities in the musical world, was prevented by illness from leading the first of the extra Monday night concerts. So the concert next Sunday afternoon will mark his first appearance at a concert open to the general public. The regular symphony concerts have been completely sold out by subscription for the first time on record.

At this first pension fund concert of the season, at Symphony Hall, the famous Russian will conduct an all-Tchaikovsky program, including the fifth symphony, the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia and the serenade for strings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 12 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

There is a particular interest locally in the forthcoming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Capitol Theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. This famous orchestra returns to Hartford after an absence of two years and the occasion will introduce Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's new conductor and one of the leading celebrities of Europe. The orchestra retains intact the remarkable personnel of last season numbering 104 musicians.

Serge Koussevitsky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestra concerts of London and Paris, and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare charm and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. He is the first Russian to lead his famous orchestra. His coming to Hartford is easily one of the outstanding musical events of the season.

The demand for seats is very heavy and early application is advised. The seat sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be taken. All orders and checks should be made payable and directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BALTIMORE,
MD.
POST
DEC 12 1924

Post Impressions

By Adele Gutman

We of the provinces always have a way of thinking that it is something that is a part of our provincialism which makes us gasp and shriek at the new things that come our way.

New York, however, is also in the process of being educated. Like Baltimore, she had her first dose of "Pacific 231" by Honneger no earlier than last week, when on Saturday the new conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussivitsky, exposed her to it. Truth compels one to admit that New York seemed less flabbergasted than Baltimore by the composition, perhaps because it came upon us unawares, perhaps because people here had already been warned that the music was supposed to represent a big locomotive getting up steam. Or perhaps the Boston conductor presented it with more intelligence than did Damrosch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
DEC 13 1924

Boston Symphony at Parsons Theater Sunday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Hartford this season for one concert under the leadership of its new conductor Serge Koussevitsky. The famous orchestra will be heard in the Capitol theater, Hartford on Sunday afternoon, February first under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The return of this orchestra to the list of Hartford's notable musical offerings for the new year will be found doubly interesting because of the first appearance in this vicinity of Mr. Koussevitsky, one of the world's truly great leaders. To real lovers of orchestral concerts, and they are legion, Mr. Koussevitsky's coming appearance is the high water mark in a season that is not without outstanding musical personalities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FITCHBURG
MASS.
SENTINEL
ISSUE OF
DEC 13 1924

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra i back on its high pedestal in New York again as the 20 concerts scheduled for that city have all sold out. The new leader of the orchestra, Pierre Monteux, received high praise from the New York critics who were ready to pick flaws if possible.

* * *

YMPHONY PROGRAM

The ninth program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be performed next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will have as soloists Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in three pieces for two pianos, a concerto by Emanuel Bach and two new scores then to have their first performance—a concerto by Arthur Bliss and a scherzo by E. B. Hill.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
SENTINEL
DEC 13 1924

Judging by the enthusiasm with which Sergei Koussevitsky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony, has been received, we should imagine that the Hub is in for a winter of most delightful concerts.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestras

IF Mr. Koussevitzky summons few "assisting artists" to the Symphony Concerts, once he has bidden them, h gives them opportunity. No less than three pieces are Messrs. Maier and Patti son to play upon two pianos (with orches tra) on Friday and Saturday of next week a Concerto by Emanuel Bach for the an cients; a Concerto dispensing with the string-choir, lately written by Mr. Arthu Bliss in modernist idiom: and the long heralded "Jazz Scherzo" of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill. It will be exhilarating t hear again the young Briton of the "Colo Symphony" last year; while Mr. Hill's piece is of the very currents of these times. Incidentally, conductor and orchestra will also be heard in Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13) and in Ravel's tone-poem, "The Waltz." A fortnightly dram of Ravel seems essential to Mr. Koussevitzky—if not to his audiences.

Tomorrow afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual concerts for the increase of its deserving and ever-needful Pension Fund. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct a band at the top of its bent; while for the first time, since his coming to America, he will be heard in the music of Chaikovsky. None other will stand on the program. The Fifth Symphony, the Fantasia, "Frances da Rimini" and [illegible]

8TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Alexander Borovsky Solo Pianist—Koussevitzky Conducts

RESPIGHI WORK GIVEN FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzy, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Alexander Borovsky was the solo pianist. The program was as follows: Old dances and airs for the lute freely arranged for orchestra by Respighi; Tchaikowsky, piano concerto, B flat minor; Corelli, Concerto Grosso, C minor, for strings and piano, Op. 6, No. 3; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

This program was changed at least thrice before final arrangement. The orchestral parts of Prokofieff's Piano Concerto did not arrive, so Tchaikovsky's was substituted. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," which had been announced, was thrown overboard: Corelli's Concerto took its place. These changes were made after the program book was ready for the press. As a result, the book contained much about the "Idyl" and nothing about Arcangelo Corelli, not even the date and birthplace of this Italian composer of the 17th century who died at Rome in 1713. Schumann's Symphony in D minor had also been announced, but it dropped out.

After this, announcements in the Program Book of forthcoming concerts should be headed: "Subject to change." Changes, not absolutely necessary, should be discouraged, if only for the sake of the learned lecturers on Monday afternoon at the Public Library, who prepare the audiences for enjoyment and profit at the concerts of the week, so that the hearers may then dilate with the proper emotion and talk with some show of intelligence to their less fortunate neighbors.

The first of the movements in Respighi's Suite was performed yesterday at a Symphony concert for the first time. Even Mr. Toscanini omitted it when he led a performance. The New England Conservatory orchestra played the whole Suite in 1922. Why Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Monteux ignored this movement is not easy to see; the music is charming in itself, and the Suite in its complete form is not too long. The performance yesterday was delightful. The beautiful oboe solo was played in a masterly manner by Mr. Longy, and the accompaniment to it will long be remembered. The middle section of the Gagliarda also made a profound impression. It would be interesting to know how much of this Suite is by Respighi; how much by the old Italian masters, named and unknown.

There was an old Grecian gentleman who apologized for the sumptuous funeral provided for his little child. There are men who have built a lordly portico for a dwelling place, and then for some reason or other, lack of funds or through caprice, contented themselves with a tasteless, shabbily furnished mansion. The opening section of Tchaikovsky's piano concerto has a compelling melodic sentence, treated gorgeously and with magnificent breadth and sweep. What follows is a curious mixture of engrossing measures and wild vulgarity. In the Name of the Prophet—figs! What is good in the work was brought out in full strength by pianist and orchestra; what is cheap and trivial for the moment held the attention. Perhaps Nicholas Rubinstein was right, after all, in his bitter, almost venomous, tirade when Tchaikovsky played it to him in private. When the concerto was brought out in Boston by Buelow, in October, 1875—it was the very first performance—a critic of this city shrewdly discovered that the first movement was not in "the classical concerto spirit." Tchaikovsky himself was amused by American reviews sent to him by Buelow. Peter wrote: "The Americans think that the first movement of my concerto 'suffers in consequence of the absence of a central idea' . . . and in the Finale this reviewer has found 'syncopation in trills, spasmodic pauses in the theme, and disturbing octave passages!' Think what healthy appetites these Americans must have: each time Buelow was obliged to repeat the whole Finale of my concerto! Nothing like this happens in our country!"

So wrote a reviewer nearly 50 years ago. What will be said in 1974 of reviews written here and in New York today? Brethren, let us not take ourselves too seriously; let us pray that no young lion of the press in 1974 will exhume reviews published in 1924 about the contemporaneous compositions and roar in savage glee.

Yet, at the risk of future ridicule, we will frankly say that to us Corelli's concerto was boresome.

The remarkable performance of Strauss's rondo consoled us. Some may think it was a too personal matter with Mr. Koussevitzy, but we like and admire him most when he breaks from tradition and lets his imagination revel fantastically. Some may take exception to certain tempi; but was not his choice of pace effective, as prankish as Till's exploits? How dramatically the scene of trial and condemnation was put before the audience. We still hear Till's squeak as he danced on air, after the thunderous verdict. Perhaps there are those who would prefer a "chaste and strictly musical" interpretation, but yesterday Till was on the stage; we saw his knavish tricks, we exulted in his coarseness, and at the end we stood looking at him as his legs twitched and dangled.

The concert will be repeated tonight. It is said that the program next week will comprise Haydn's Symphony, G major (B. & H. No. 13), and Ravel's "La Valse." It is also said that Messrs. Maier and Pattison will play C. P. E. Bach's Concerto, E flat major, for two pianos; Bliss's Concerto for two pianos and Hill's Scherzo for two pianos.

PARS REGISTRATION

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Till's Rare Conceits in Old Legend

Fragments of the Mediaeval Tales of Roguery from Which Strauss Drew His Merry Knave

SINCE the day when Claude Debussy first heard Strauss's rondo of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and described it as "an hour of new music at the madhouse . . . full of genius . . . in the prodigious surety of the instrumentation, and the mad spirit that sweeps one along from beginning to end," there have been many in the concert-halls to echo the opinion. "Till" has been performed and performed again, one of the most lively and capricious of Strauss's tone-poems, if not the most puissant. But it is doubtful—in America at least—whether more than a scattering of those who have applauded the orchestral Till have had better than a bowing acquaintance with the Till of legend. In America Till has not—as holds true elsewhere—been as familiar a figure of nursery lore as are the characters of Mother Goose' fables or of Hans Andersen's fairy tales.

Till, as Strauss depicted him, indulges in a number of genial rogueries: sets the market-place in an uproar, mocks the learned doctors, apes the priesthood, plays at gallantry, and is at last hanged for his pains from the gibbet. Till in legend was quite as waggish, yet escaped the scaffold to die comfortably in his bed. Perhaps, in view of the reappearance of "Till" at the Symphony Concerts this week it is not inapropos to reprint from the most spirited modrn translation of the old German legends—that by Mr. K. R. H. MacKenzie, issued in this country by E. P. Dutton and Company as one of the "Broadway Translations"—a few typical passages.

First might one relate how Owlglass became a doctor and did cure many folk:

The city of Frankfort is a great and handsome city, and in it do dwell many worshipful burghers, whose riches are great, and they eat and drink much, as is the custom with citizens; thus it fortunes that they are often ill. No marvel therefore that in Frankfort abide many doctors, who gain much money. Now young Tyll Owlglass, when that he came there, by his ready wit soon perceived the better part to take, and hired himself to be a doctor's man, and soon it was meet that he should go with his master to visit the patients. The good Owlglass would much have desired to know something of the names on the bottles which stood in the house of his master; but that could he not do, and therefore of all that his master did he could learn nothing but that when people were sick, they should drink warm water and be blooded. It fortuned in no long time thereafter, that his master had on a sudden to take a journey, in such wise that he had no time to tell the patients thereof. Then spake he unto Owlglass, saying: "Go thou about the city unto the sick, and say unto them that in no long time shall I return unto them."

Yet the cunning Master Owlglass followed not his master's saying, but put on his head the wig of his master, and on his shoulders, he bare his mantle. Then, with a grave and noble demeanor, he departed at the houses of the sick patients who sent for him. When that he arrived, he sat gravely down with a serious face, felt their pulses, and after much heavy thought, he ordered them always to be blooded and to drink warm water. Thereafter he departed from them.

Then, marvellous to tell, all his patients grew wonderously well in no long time, and they paid him much money for his pains. When that his master returned, the knavery of Owlglass was soon discovered, and he was fain to depart. Yet such was the wisdom of good Master Owlglass, that it is related that his master thereafter folowed no other art than had been thus invented by Owlglass; and after that time the doctor became famous, and wrote a large book upon the virtue of warm water and blood-letting.

Or how that Owlglass did at Bremen of the Market Women buy milk:

A pleasant jest wrought Owlglass at Bremen. At one season when that he came thither, he stood on the market, and he beheld that the boors' women brought great store of milk thereto; and therefore he 'gan to think what a merry piece of knavery he might perform. Therefore he tarried awhile until a day on which the market was very full, and much milk was brought thither, and he fetched him a great tun, the which he set upon the market-place, and cried aloud unto the boors' women that they should turn unto him, for he would buy their milk, and they should pour it into the tun. And every good wife of the which he took milk he bade write the measure and price therefor upon a paper, and then sit down, for he would pay the money when that the tun was filled.

So the boors' wives sat in a circle around Owlglass, and waited for their money, and rejoiced greatly at such a noble milk merchant (for they knew him not); and it cameto pass, that after a while there was not any good wife woh had milk to sell. Then Owlglass opened his mouth and spake unto the women, and said unto them these words: "Today have I not any money inpouch. And such of ye as cannot abide and give me credit for a matter of fourteen days would do best to take forth her milk again:" and having thus maliciously ended his speech, he hasted to go away from the market place. Thereafter contended the boors' wives with much anger, and each would fain take her milk out of the tun first, and in their quarrellings the milk was spilled on the ground and on their clothes and in their eyes; and it did most certainly appear as if milk from the clouds had been rained down. And all the townspeople beheld the merry conceit, and they were greatly contented with the wit of Master Owlglass.

Or how that Owlglass practised the White Magic in the selfsame marketplace:

Now the Bishop at Bremen loved Owlglass much; and, by reason of his great wit and continual jests, did hold him in great honor. And he caused the bishop oftentimes to laugh right merrily, so that he gave unto Owlglass a house, in the which he had free provisions granted unto him by the bishop. When that he arrived there, Owlglass did as if he were tired, and desired to give up his knaveries, and was fain to enter unto the church there to pray. At that mocked the bishop—as bishops have done before that time and since—at the resolve of Owlglass. Yet would he not be persuaded, but gat him unto the church and prayed, until that time that he could not any longer bear the quips and quiddities the which were put upon him by the bishop. And privily had Owlglass with a market woman agreed, and she was the wife of a potter, and in the market-place sat she with pots and pans to sell: then did Owlglass pay unto the woman the price of all her ware, and enjoined her what she should do when that he gave unto her a sign.

Thereafter departed Owlglass, and came unto the bishop, as if he had come from the church, and the bishop reviled and mocked Master Owlglass, in that he was so pious and not any longer the same man. At last Owlglass said unto the bishop: "Gracious prince and reverend father! do ye now grant me to come unto the market-place, and there sitteth a potter's wife, and a wager will I set with you, that without my speaking unto her, or making a sign unto her with mine eye I will cause, by magical words, the which I will mutter, that she shall arise up and take a stick and herself break in pieces all her ware." Then said the bishop unto Owlglass: "Such a thing would I fain behold." Therefore with him made the bishop a wager of thirty pieces of gold that the woman did it not. And Owlglass did accept the wager, and with the bishop gat him unto the market-place. Then did Owlglass show unto the bishop the woman where she sate, and they departed, and sate upon the house of the town council hard by. Then 'gan Owlglass to make incantation and conjuration, at the which stirred the potter's wife not a whit, and in good sooth the bishop rejoiced that he has most truly won his wager. At last gave Owlglass the sign unto the woman, the which they had agreed; thereupon arose she up and taking a stick. doth soundly belabour the ware, and breaketh it all in pieces very small. And with much content laughed the bishop yet was vexed in the matter of the thirty pieces of gold the which he had manifestly lost unto Master Owlglass. And when that they came unto the bishop's court, did he confer privily with Owlglass, and said unto him: "If that he could discover unto him after what manner he had so brought it to pass that the woman should, after that wise, have broken her wares in pieces, then would he pay unto him the thirty pieces of gold." Then answered Owlglass unto the bishop, and said unto him: "Yea, gracious lord, that will I most cheerfully do." And therewith said unto him: "Most simple was this matter in every particular, for I paid unto the woman the price of her wares before that she brake them, and I made agreement with her beside."

Then laughed the bishop right merrily, and paid unto him the thirty pieces of gold, requiring of him that he should not disclose unto anyone that which had come to pass. And if he kept his counsel, the bishop promised him that he would help him to a good fat ox thereto. "Yes," quoth Master Owlglass, and thereafter departed thence. Now when that the bishop sate at meat with his knights and gentlefolk, he opened his mouth and said unto them: "That he had learned an art whereby he might cause the potter's wife to break in sunder all her ware." Then the knights and gentlefolk craved much to know how this was done, and desired much to see the same performed; and this sheweth that in all times are men rather desirous to know how a mystery may be unfolded than patiently to follow it and wait until it doth itself give unto them the explication they would have. Then said the bishop: "Lo! an if ye will each of you give unto me a good fat ox for my kitchen, will I teach ye all this art."

And it came to pass that it was the autumn season when the oxen were at the best. Then thought each noble knight and gentleman: "This will not be a great charge unto me, truly then will I do it for in this art to become learned." Thus did the bishop have of them sixteen fat oxen, and such was their price, that thereby was the bishop recompensed some three-fold for

Continued on Page Eleven

Waggish

Till Eulenspiegel

As Robert Edmond Jones Sketched Him for Nijinsky's Ballet Based Upon St...

Continued from Page Eight

the thirty pieces of gold which he had paid unto Owlglass. And at this time came Owlglass riding thither upon his horse, and he said unto the bishop, "Of this booty is the half mine." And the bishop answered, and said unto him: "If that thou dost hold thy promise unto me, will I faithfully perform unto thee our contract; do thou leave me that which I have won." Then gave the bishop unto Owlglass a good fat ox, the which, with great reverence, did Owlglass receive from him. Thereupon did the bishop discover unto his knights and gentlefolk in what manner they could perform the same marvellous thing, according to that wise by which he had learned it himself; for that Owlglass had paid unto the woman the price of her wares ere she brake them.

Then sate the noble knights and gentlemen silently upon their stools, and perceived that with cunning they had been beguiled; nor could they in any wise murmur thereat. So one scratched his head, and his neighbor sought for comfort in his neck, and they were sorely troubled for the loss of their oxen. But it could not be otherwise answered, and therefore comforted they themselves in that unto their gracious lord the profit had fallen; yet grieved they for their foolishness. But Owlglass rejoiced thereat, and departed with his booty. Thus may ye see, my masters, that when a wise man, like unto Owlglass, with a bishop [illegible] under

How that Owlglass, brought at last to his death-bed, did make generous distribution of his property:

Now when that Owlglass lay sick, every day grew he weaker; and knew that his death was approaching; therefore he made his will, and in three parts did he divide his wealth,—the one part gave he unto his friends, and the other unto the town council of Möllen, to pay the debts which lay upon the town, and the third part unto the priest of that place But he made one stipulation, and cause them to promise that they would bury him in the holy earth of the churchyard, and after a Christian wise sing and say a mass and vigil for his sinful soul; and then, after four weeks, should they open the chest in the which lay his treasure, and the which chest was with three most excellent locks shut, and unto each gave Owlglass one key, and they accepted the trust of him and then bidding them all farewell and enjoyment of the wealth he left unto them, he gently gave up the ghost, and so from this world departed— one of the best and nobl'est men the which Germany had ever seen; nor since that time hath there been any like unto him in rarity of wit or subtlety of heart. And though there by no lack of fools and knaves who chouse and cozen, yet do none of them perform such chousing and cozening to the glory and advantage of true wisdom, in manner and form as did Owlglass.

And after the four weeks were gone by and all things had been duly accomplished according to the promise made unto him came the council, and the priest and friends of [illegible]

they nought but stones. Then grew the angry and strove together; and each believe that the other had from the chest taken the treasure. But it was not so for of a truth understood they not until afterward, that all treasure is indeed of greater account than stones. For a lusty frame and a cheerful heart be the best riches.

And how that our ever-prized master Owlglass, was buried:

And at the buryng of Owlglass was there a most wond'rous strange thing. For when that they all stood in the graveyard round the coffin in the which he lay, they took ropes to let it down into the grave and, of these twain ropes, brake the one which was under his feet, and the coffin fell down, and stood on end. Thus was Owlglass in his grave. And the folk around marvelled greatly thereat, and said 'Nay, let him stand an if he will; for his life wrought he many great marvels and he will be strange in death likewise.' Then they filled the grave with earth, and above his head set a stone, and on it they cunningly hew the likeness of an owl who within his claws bare a glass, upon the stone set the words which follow:

EPITAPHIUM

This stone dare none to overthrow,
For Owlglass upright stands below.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Till's Rare Conceits in Old Legend

Fragments of the Mediaeval Tales of Roguery from Which Strauss Drew His Merry Knave

SINCE the day when Claude Debussy first heard Strauss's rondo of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and described it as "an hour of new music at the madhouse . . . full of genius . . . in the prodigious surety of the instrumentation, and the mad spirit that sweeps one along from beginning to end," there have been many in the concert-halls to echo the opinion. "Till" has been performed and performed again, one of the most lively and capricious of Strauss's tone-poems, if not the most puissant. But it is doubtful—in America at least—whether more than a scattering of those who have applauded the orchestral Till have had better than a bowing acquaintance with the Till of legend. In America Till has not—as holds true elsewhere—been as familiar a figure of nursery lore as are the characters of Mother Goose' fables or of Hans Andersen's fairy tales.

Till, as Strauss depicted him, indulges in a number of genial rogueries: sets the market-place in an uproar, mocks the learned doctors, apes the priesthood, plays at gallantry, and is at last hanged for his pains from the gibbet. Till in legend was quite as waggish, yet escaped the scaffold to die comfortably in his bed. Perhaps, in view of the reappearance of "Till" at the Symphony Concerts this week it is not inapropos to reprint from the first spirited modrn translation of the old German legends—that by Mr. K. F. H. Mackenzie, issued in this country by E. P. Dutton and Company as one of the "Broadway Translations"—a few typical passages.

Firstwhile one relate how Owlglass became a doctor and did cure many folk:

The city of Frankfort is a great and handsome city, and in it do dwell many worshipful burghers, whose riches are great, for they eat and drink much, as is the custom with citizens; thus it fortunes that they are often ill. No marvel therefore that in Frankfort abide many doctors, who gain much money. Now young Tyll Owlglass when that he came there, by his ready wit soon perceived the better part to take and hired himself to be a doctor's man, and soon it was meet that he should ride with his master to visit the patients. The good Owlglass would much have wished to know something of the names of the bottles which stood in the house of his master; but that could he not do, wherefore of all that his master did he could learn nothing but that when people were sick, they should drink warm water and be blooded. It fortuned in no long time thereafter, that his master had occasion to take a journey, in such wise that he had no time to tell the patients what to do. Then spake he unto Owlglass, saying: Go thou about the city unto the sick and say unto them that in no long time will I return unto them."

Then the cunning Master Owlglass followed not this master's saying, but put on instead the wig of his master, and on his shoulders, he bare his mantle. Then, with a grave and noble demeanor, he departed unto the houses of the sick patients who sent for him. When that he arrived, he sat gravely down with a serious face, felt their pulses, and after much heavy thought, he ordered them always to be blooded and to drink warm water. Thereafter he departed from them.

Then, marvellous to tell, all his patients grew wonderously well in no long time, and they paid him much money for his pains. When that his master returned, the knavery of Owlglass was soon discovered, and he was fain to depart. Yet such was the wisdom of good Master Owlglass, that it is related that his master thereafter folowed no other art than had been thus invented by Owlglass; and after that time the doctor became famous, and wrote a large book upon the virtue of warm water and blood-letting.

Or how that Owlglass did at Bremen of the Market Women buy milk:

A pleasant jest wrought Owlglass at Bremen. At one season when that he came thither, he stood on the market, and he beheld that the boors' women brought great store of milk thereto; and therefore he 'gan to think what a merry piece of knavery he might perform. Therefore he tarried awhile until a day on which the market was very full, and much milk was brought thither, and he fetched him a great tun, the which he set upon the market-place, and cried aloud unto the boors' women that they should turn unto him, for he would buy their milk, and they should pour it into the tun. And every good wife of the which he took milk he bade write the measure and price therefor upon a paper, and then sit down, for he would pay the money when that the tun was filled.

So the boors' wives sat in a circle around Owlglass, and waited for their money, and rejoiced greatly at such a noble milk merchant (for they knew him not); and it cameto pass, that after a while there was not any good wife woh had milk to sell. Then Owlglass opened his mouth and spake unto the women, and said unto them these words: "Today have I not any money inpouch. And such of ye as cannot abide and give me credit for a matter of fourteen days would do best to take forth her milk again:" and having thus maliciously ended his speech, he hasted to go away from the market place. Thereafter contended the boors' wives with much anger, and each would fain take her milk out of the tun first, and in their quarrellings the milk was spilled on the ground and on their clothes and in their eyes; and it did most certainly appear as if milk from the clouds had been rained down. And all the townspeople beheld the merry conceit, and they were greatly contented with the wit of Master Owlglass.

Or how that Owlglass practised the White Magic in the selfsame marketplace:

Now the Bishop at Bremen loved Owlglass much; and, by reason of his great wit and continual jests, did hold him in great honor. And he caused the bishop oftentimes to laugh right merrily, so that he gave unto Owlglass a house, in the which he had free provisions granted unto him by the bishop. When that he arrived there, Owlglass did as if he were tired, and desired to give up his knaveries, and was fain to enter unto the church there to pray. At that mocked the bishop—as bishops have done before that time and since—at the resolve of Owlglass. Yet would he not be persuaded, but gat him unto the church and prayed, until that time that he could not any longer bear the quips and quiddities the which were put upon him by the bishop. And privily had Owlglass with a market woman agreed, and she was the wife of a potter, and in the market-place sat she with pots and pans to sell: then did Owlglass pay unto the woman the price of all her ware, and enjoined her what she should do when that he gave unto her a sign.

Thereafter departed Owlglass, and came unto the bishop, as if he had come from the church, and the bishop reviled and mocked Master Owlglass, in that he was so pious and not any longer the same man. At last Owlglass said unto the bishop: "Gracious prince and reverend father! do ye now grant me to come unto the market-place, and there sitteth a potter's wife, and a wager will I set with you, that without my speaking unto her, or making a sign unto her with mine eye I will cause, by magical words, the which I will mutter, that she shall arise up and take a stick and herself break in pieces all her ware." Then said the bishop unto Owlglass: "Such a thing would I fain behold." Therefore with him made the bishop a wager of thirty pieces of gold that the woman did it not. And Owlglass did accept the wager, and with the bishop gat him unto the market-place. Then did Owlglass show unto the bishop the woman where she sate, and they departed, and sate upon the house of the town council hard by. Then 'gan Owlglass to make incantation and conjuration, at the which stirred the potter's wife not a whit, and in good sooth the bishop rejoiced that he has most truly won his wager. At last gave Owlglass the sign unto the woman, the which they had agreed; thereupon arose she up and taking a stick, doth soundly belabour the ware, and breaketh it all in pieces very small. And with much content laughed the bishop yet was vexed in the matter of the thirty pieces of gold the which he had manifestly lost unto Master Owlglass. And when that they came unto the bishop's court, did he confer privily with Owlglass, and said unto him: "If that he could discover unto him after what manner he had so brought it to pass that the woman should, after that wise, have broken her wares in pieces, then would he pay unto him the thirty pieces of gold." Then answered Owlglass unto the bishop, and said unto him: "Yea, gracious lord, that will I most cheerfully do." And therewith said unto him: "Most simple was this matter in every particular, for I paid unto the woman the price of her wares before that she brake them, and I made agreement with her beside."

Then laughed the bishop right merrily, and paid unto him the thirty pieces of gold, requiring of him that he should not disclose unto anyone that which had come to pass. And if he kept his counsel, the bishop promised him that he would help him to a good fat ox thereto. "Yes," quoth Master Owlglass, and thereafter departed thence. Now when that the bishop sate at meat with his knights and gentlefolk, he opened his mouth and said unto them: "That he had learned an art whereby he might cause the potter's wife to break in sunder all her ware." Then the knights and gentlefolk craved much to know how this was done, and desired much to see the same performed; and this sheweth that in all times are men rather desirous to know how a mystery may be unfolded than patiently to follow it and wait until it doth itself give unto them the explication they would have. Then said the bishop: "Lo! an if ye will each of ye give unto me a good fat ox for my kitchen, will I teach ye all this art."

And it came to pass that it was the autumn season when the oxen were at the best. Then thought each noble knight and gentleman: "This will not be a great charge unto me, truly then will I do it for in this art to become learned." Thus did the bishop have of them sixteen fat oxen, and such was their price, that thereby was the bishop recompensed some three-fold for

Continued on Page Eleven

Waggish

Till Eulenspiegel

As Robert Edmond Jones Sketched Him for Nijinsky's Ballet Based Upon St...

...ued from Page Eight

...ieces of gold which he had paid ...ss. And at this time came Owl... thither upon his horse, and ... the bishop, "Of this booty is ..." And the bishop answered, ...nd M... him: "If that thou dost hold ...hristm... unto me, will I faithfully per... our contract; do thou leave ... I have won." Then gave ... Owlglass a good fat ox, ...a Chris... great reverence, did Owl... by them... him. Thereupon did ...h Nichol... over unto his knights and ...tesses wi... at manner they could per... Ethel ... marvellous thing, accord... by which he had learned ... that Owlglass had paid ... the price of her wares ere Winthro...

...e Valley ...obble knights and gentle... by Mrs... their stools, and per... antholog... running they had been ...he meetin... they in any wise mur... Mrs. Gra...ne scratched his head, ... afternoon... sought for comfort in ... were sorely troubled ... open. But it could ...session o... wered, and therefore ...is to be ...ves in that unto ...en of mem... profit had fallen; ...a visit from... foolishness. But ...kling will b... at, and departed ... may ye see, my ... man, like unto ... with under one

How that Owlglass, brought at last to his death-bed, did make generous distribution of his property:

Now when that Owlglass lay sick, every day grew he weaker; and knew that his death was approaching; therefore he made his will, and in three parts did he divide his wealth,—the one part gave he unto his friends, and the other unto the town council of Möllen, to pay the debts which lay upon the town, and the third part unto the priest of that place But he made one stipulation, and cause them to promise that they would bury him in the holy earth of the churchyard, and after a Christian wise sing and say a mass and vigil for his sinful soul; and then, after four weeks, should they open the chest in the which lay his treasure, and the which chest was with three most excellent locks shut, and unto each gave Owlglass one key, and they accepted the trust of him and then bidding them all farewell and enjoyment of the wealth he left unto them, he gently gave up the ghost, and so from this world departed— one of the best and nob'est men the which Germany had ever seen; nor since that time hath there been any like unto him in rarity of wit or subtlety of heart. And though there by no lack of fools and knaves who chouse and cozen, yet do none of them perform such chousing and cozening to the glory and advantage of true wisdom, in manner and form as did Owlglass.

And after the four weeks were gone by and all things had been duly accomplished according to the promise made unto him came the council, and the priest and ...friends of...

they nought but stones. Then grew the angry and strove together; and each believe that the other had from the chest taken the treasure. But it was not so for of a truth understood they not until afterward, that all treasure is indeed of greater account than stones. For a lusty frame and a cheerful heart be the best riches.

And how that our ever-prised master, Owlglass, was buried:

And at the buryng of Owlglass was there a most wondrous strange thing. For when that they all stood in the graveyard round the coffin in the which he lay, they took ropes to let it down into the grave and, of these twain ropes, brake the one which was under his feet, and the coffin fell down, and stood on end. Thus was Owlglass in his grave. And the folk around marvelled greatly thereat, and said 'Nay, let him stand an if he will; for his life wrought he many great marvels and he will be strange in death likewise.' Then they filled the grave with earth, and above his head set a stone, and on it they cunningly hew the likeness of an ape who within his claws bare a glass, and upon the stone set the words which follow:

EPITAPHIUM

This stone dare none to overthrow,
For Owlglass upright stands below.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

226

Transcript
Dec. 13

Paying the Way of Music

New List, for 1924-'25, of Subscribers to the Deficit at the Symphony Concerts

The Need: $84,000. The Pledges: $70,300. To Balance: $13,700

THE treasurer and the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been doing sums. They added together the annual differences between income and expenditures for the past three years. They divided the total by three, and the quotient, in round figures, was $84,000—the average of the present seasonal deficit. By the signs of the times, it is not likely to be much more or appreciably less for the current musical year, 1924-25. Next the trustees counted the subscriptions already pledged to offset this loss, and the amount, on Tuesday last, was $70,300.99. After a final sum in subtraction, they set $14,000 as the necessary addition to this working capital; and now ask it "of those who believe the Symphony Concerts important in the life of Boston and who are willing to help them financially." They do not say, as they might wisely and truly have said, that the orchestra is more economically administered than any similar body in America; and that its annual deficit is one of the lowest on public or private record.

Instead, upon pages of the program-book for the current concerts, the trustees ask simply and directly for the additional $14,000 necessary to their treasury. They note, in passing, that the general Endowment Fund of the concerts now stands at $148,886.42; the special Endowment Fund, in memory of Henry L. Higginson, at $25,025. Subscriptions to all these funds—but most desirably to the deficit for the present year—may be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street. Finally, the Trustees submit an impressive list of subscribers already pledged in Boston and vicinity, or, occasionally, in remoter cities. Here it is:

Abbott, Gordon
Adams, Clara A.
Alford, Mrs. O. H.
Ames, Oakes
Ames, Mrs. William H.
Anthony, A. R.
Anthony, Margaret
Apthorp, Mrs. H. O.
Aubin, Margaret H.

Barkhouse, Mrs. Arthur J.
Barlow, R. S.
Barnet, Mr. and Mrs. S. J.
Barrett, Mrs. William E.
Bartol, Mrs. John W.
Beach, John P.
Beal, Mrs. Boylston
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel (Providence)
Beebe, Sylenda
Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. A. Farwell
Bentinck-Smith, Mrs. W. F.
Best, Mrs. Edward H.
Blake, Mrs. Arthur W.
Bliss, Henry W.
Bradford, Mary G.
Bradlee, Mrs. Arthur T.
Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S.
Brandegee, Mr. and Mrs. E. D.
Brown, George W.
Bruzza, L. (Brooklyn)
Buckingham, M. H.
Bullard, Ellen T.
Burnham, Helen C.
Burnham, M. C.
Burr, I. Tucker

Cabot, Mrs. Arthur T.
Cabot, Frederick P.
Carter, Mrs. J. W.
Case, Louise W.
Chapin, Horace D.
Chapin, Mabel H.
Chapin, Mrs. Mary G. (Providence)
Chase, Mrs. Henry M.
Coale, George O. G.
Coale, Mrs. George O. G.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul (New Haven)
Codman, C. A.
Codman, Mrs. Russell S.
Colt, Mr. and Mrs. James D.
Coolidge, Mrs. J. G.
Coolidge, Mrs. J. T.
Coolidge, Mrs. Julian
Cotting, Mrs. C. E.
Crafts, Mrs. George P. (Manchester, N. H.)
Craig, Mrs. Helen M.
Crosby, Mrs. S. V. R.
Curtis, Frances G.
Curtis, Estate of Mrs. G. S.
Cushing, Sarah P.
Cushing, Mrs. W. E.
Cutler, Mrs. C. H.
Cutler, Elisabeth A.

Dana, Dr. Harold W.
Dane, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B.
Daniels, Mabel W.
Day, Mrs. Henry B.
Derby, Elizabeth P.
Dexter, Rose L.
Dole, Mrs. Charles F.
Dowse, William B. H.
Dupee, W. A.

Eager, Mabel T.
Eaton, B. L.
Edwards, Hannah M.
Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. William
Elliot, Mrs. J. W.
Ellis, Helen
Ely, Augusta C.
Ely, Elizabeth B.
Endicott, S. C.
Eustis, H. D.
Eustis, The Misses

Farlow, Dr. and Mrs. John W.
Farrington, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Douglas
Fay, Mrs. D. B.
Fenollosa, William S.
Fish, Frederick P.
Fisher, Edith
Fisher, Frances B.
Fitch, Carrie T.
Fitz, Mrs. W. Scott
Foote, Arthur
Foote, George L.
Fox, Felix
Frankenstein, Lina H.
French, Katharine
Frothingham, Mrs. Louis A.

Gay, E. Howard
Gilbert, Mrs. Ellen J.
Gray, Mrs. John Chipman
Greene, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Farnham
Greenfield, Joseph Baram
Greenough, Mrs. H. V.
Griswold, Roger Guild, Eleanor Guild, S. L.

Hall, Mrs. Frederick G.
Hall, Mrs. H. S.
Hallowell, N. Penrose
Haughton, Mrs. M. G.
Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. George
Hellman, William C.
Herman, Mrs. Joseph M.
Hicks, Mrs. John Jay
Higginson, Mrs. F. L.
Hill, Arthur D.
Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B.
Hill, Mrs. John F.
Homans, Marian Hornblower, Henry
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry
Houghton, Clement S.
Howe, Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. Henry S.
Hoyt, Mrs. C. C.
Hunnewell, Mrs. Arthur
Hunnewell, Mrs. Henry S.
Hunt, Miss Abby W.
Huntsman, Ray

Ivers, Ella F.

Jackson, Mrs. Henry
Jackson, Marian C.
Johns, Clayton
Johnson, Arthur S.
Johnson, Mrs. C. J.
Johnson, Edith Morse

Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Carl J.
Kaufman, M. B.
Keeler, Mrs. L. M.
Kent, Mrs. Edward L.
Kimball, The Misses
King, The Misses
Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham
Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse

Lang, Mrs. B. J.
Lang, Margaret Ruthven
Lanz, Jeanne M. (Brooklyn).
Lapham, Henry G.
Lasell, Josiah M.
Latimer, J. W. (Brooklyn).
Lawrence, Mrs. John
Lee, George C.
Lee, Joseph
Leland, Mrs. Lester
Leman, J. Howard
Lewis, Mrs. George
Little, Mrs. David M.
Loring, Katharine P.
Lowell, Lucy
Luce, Stephen B.
Lyman, Arthur
Lyon, Mrs. George Armstrong
Lyons, John A.

Manning, Mr. and Mrs. Earl G.
Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse H. (Providence).
Miller, Mildred A.
Milliken, Arthur N.
Milliken, Mrs. James I.
Moir, Mrs. John
Moore, Mrs. Edward C.
Moors, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W.
Morse, Henry Lee
Morse, J. G.
Morse, J. Torrey
Morss, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A.
Motley, Mrs. E. Preble
Murdock, Mr. and Mrs. Harold McMichael, Mrs. L. G.

Newell, Mrs. Edward A.
Norcross, Mrs. Otis
Nutter, George R.

Osgood, Mrs. E. L.
Osgood, Emily L.

Paine, Rev. George L.
Paine, R. T., 2d
Parker, Mrs. Edward L.
Parkman, Mrs. Henry
Patton, James E.
Pearce, Ella Gilmore (Yonkers).
Perera, Mrs. Gino L.
Pfaelzer, Mrs. Franklin T.
Pierce, Mrs. Edgar
Pierce, Mrs. M. V.
Pingree, Mrs. Arthur H.
Post, Mrs. John R.
Putnam, Mrs. James J.

Rand, E. K.
Ranney, Helen M.
Rantoul, Mrs. Neal
Richardson, Mrs. Charles F.
Richardson, Mrs. John
Richardson, W. K.
Ripley, Alfred L.
Roberts, Mrs. Coolidge S.
Rousmaniere, Mrs. E. S.

Sachs, Paul J.
Saltonstall, Richard
Sanger, Mrs. Charles R.
Sanger, Mrs. George P.
Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. E. H.
Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Schneider, Elizabeth
Scott, Mrs. Arnold
Sears, Annie L.
Sears, Mary P.
Sears, Mrs. Montgomery
Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Richard D.
Sears, William R.
Shattuck, Lillian
Shaw, Mrs. Henry S.
Shepard, Mrs. Willis S.
Slattery, Mrs. Charles Lewis
Slocum, Mrs. William H.
Smith, Mr. and Mrs. F. Morton
Sortwell, Mrs. A. F.
Spalding, Walter R.
Squibb, Dr. Edward H. (Brooklyn).
Stackpole, Mrs. Frederick D.
Stanford, Mrs. Daniel
Stanton, Katharine
Steedman, Mrs. C. J.
Steinert, Alexander
Steinway, Frederick T. (New York)
Stevens, Moses T.
Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Galen L.
Streeter, Mrs. E. C.

Tapley, Alice P.
Tapley, Henry F.
Thayer, Mrs. Bayard
Thayer, Mrs. W. H.
Tower, Miss Florence E.
Tozzer, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred M.
Turner, Nellie B.

Van Raalte, Albert (In Memoriam)
Vaughan, Bertha H.

Wadsworth, Mrs. A. F.
Waring, Mrs. Guy
Warner, Elizabeth
Warren, Mrs. Bayard
Watson, Mrs. Thomas R.
Weeks, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S.
Welch, E. Sohier
Weld, Mrs. Bernard C.
Weld, Mrs. Charles G.
Wells, Mrs. Webster
Wetherbee, Martha
Wheelwright, Mary C.
White, Gertrude R.
Whitin, Mrs. G. Marston
Whiting, Mrs. Jasper
Whitman, William
Whitney, Mrs. Margaret F. G.
Whittier, Mrs. Albert R.
Williams, Moses
Wilson, A. E.
Wolcott, Mrs. Roger
Wright, Mrs. Walter P.

Globe
Dec. 13

Concerts

BORESOME ANCIENTS: CHAIKOVSKY REBORN: GENIUS AND GENIUS

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY UP AND DOWN THE SCALE

A Tedious Concerto from Corelli—Respighi's Over-Praised and Over-Played Old Dances—The Russian's Piano-Concerto Thrills After Nine Years of Slumber — Strauss's "Till" for Marvel — Pianist, Mr. Borovsky

TWO months ago when Mr. Koussevitzky joined together Handel, Schmitt, de Falla and Beethoven of the Fifth Symphony in a single programme the ancients—if Beethoven may be so counted—had much the better of it. Yesterday afternoon, when he assembled at Symphony Hall old Italian airs and dances, Chaikovsky, Corelli and Strauss, the advantage was as decisively with the moderns—not the modernists, for they were unrepresented—but with the honorable and by no means ancient Piano-Concerto of Peter the First and the evergreen rogue's tune, otherwise "Till Eulenspiegel," of Richard the Second. Upon eight programs the conductor according to his inclination and habit has set a deal of seventeenth-and-eighteenth-century music, rare, interesting, usually impressive, and always discerningly played. At the Symphony Concert of Friday came the exception that, by American proverb, proved the rule—a Concerto Grosso for Strings and Piano by old Corelli. It was a substituted piece, at the eleventh hour, for Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and the few aware of the change presumed it "homage" to Mr. Borovsky, with the visiting virtuoso to play the piano-part. As it was, Mr. Arthur Fiedler's raven-locks bobbed up behind that instrument, and the share of the piano in the piece proved exceedingly small.

Rather, the Concerto was music for string choir parted, blended, divided and again reunited—that stately, streaming, large-lined music beloved, not only in Concerti Grossi, by Latin and northern composers of the seventeenth century. True, Corelli's particular Concerto is not long; but it is boresome. Hardly once does the matter, or the mood, or the manner of progress, alter. Onward and onward goes the austere counterpoint; stripped are the harmonies; steadfast the rhythms; changeless the contrasts and the fusions of timbres; ever the lordly stride and the plangent course. The listening ear repented of the days in which it had disdained as monotony the lively patter, the reiterated figures, of Bach's or Handel's Allegros. Now it pined for such lightsomeness. In its haste, it had been as scornful of succulent melody—and here it was, prisoned in Corelli's angular patterns. "Put not your trust in princes" righteously cries the Psalmist, and this Concerto Grosso persisted in princeliness. Before a company of Grands Seigneurs, in a vast Italian room, their "master of musick" was pluming and strutting. At last he was done.

Nor do Respighi's half-transcribed, half-invented, old dances and airs for the lute bear too frequent repetition; while little more than a year ago, Mr. Monteux played three of them. Yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky added the fourth—the first in the order of the score—a Balletto by Melinari, that breeds neither boredom nor interest. It is brief; it is archaic according to the conventions; with the final note, it slips out of memory. In fact, with the exception of the Villanella, Respighi's pieces too often repeat those same conventions. There is the lively beginning, which Mr. Koussevitzky quickened; the lively close which he also brightened; the gentle and songful intermezzo over which he dallied. Obviously makers and hearers of music in the sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries loved their formulas like a bedtime story. Unfortunately they are not alike ours, in this good year of 1924. The Villanella is another matter. The slowly charms; the euphonies of flute, oboe, and strings caress; through the pavill sounds that gentle, musing melancholy which our restless age most welcomes of cherishes in this ancient music. We have our old lavender in tones and yesterday it exhaled from the Villanella Respighi—and an "unknown" sixteenth century composer. Yet the repetition of these lute-pieces served a timely purpose. Of late, some have believed that they detected a slight coarsening in the string and the wood-wind choirs of the orchestra. In the four old dances they returned the doubters triumphant disproof.

Blessed, then, be Peter Iltisch Chaikovsky of the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in B-flat minor, unplayed these nine seasons at the Symphony Concerts; fifty years old and still playable—music, none the less, of a romantic Russian, of a modern, as moderns went in 1874, for once free of his morbidities. Mr. Alexander Borovsky of Petersburg, Paris, Moscow and half the concert-rooms of the world, took the solo-part. His tone was bright, clear, crisp and dry—champagne-like. He answered to rhythm sustained or broken; in pace was no less elastic. Content was he with his piano as such, of no mind to embattle it with the orchestra. He heard the sentimental Chaikovsky in the Andantino; the ardent and voluble Chaikovsky in the Finale. He declaimed; he sang; he otherwise sounded through the long first movement. A stodgy Slav to see, Mr. Borovsky is yet an able pianist.

As for Mr. Koussevitzky, he played the Concerto as he will, doubtless, play more of Chaikovsky's music on Sunday, in flashes of genius. Beyond recollection at any other hand, vibrated certain rhythms (as at the very beginning); sounded certain chords and progressions (as when the piano would shepherd the orchestra before it). "Gorgeous" (as the lads of the university say) though not unlabored, was the return of the songful theme in first movement and Finale. Between pianist and conductor, the melody of the Andantino purled. Lightly rhythmed was the little intermezzo; while, through the finale the rhythmic flair and the cumulating fire of Mr. Koussevitzky rejuvenated the music.

Yet quite by himself Chaikovsky came not ill off. He begins as a composer with powers well concentrated. There are sinew, stride and pulse in the music. With it expectation mounts. The dominant melody of the first movement is an invention; while with imagination Chaikovsky sets it in play. Now and again he flags and 1874 is written plainly on the piece. Yet soon the energy, fertility, suspense, return and carry all before them. The slow movement sings like a brook among the stones; music and piano are as one voice; too content is Chaikovsky to be brooding or moody or bathetic. There is no resisting the rhythmic whirl of the finale, the opening of the spinning tonal heavens to "let through" that first theme of song. The young Chaikovsky wrote the Concerto in B-flat minor. Better than many a music of his maturity, it withstands the changing years. Not too often or for too long has it faded. The thrills deaden not nor perish. The zest of freedom was in him as he wrote.

After Chaikovsky the romantic, Strauss for the music of character all compact. Not since Dr. Muck's day—or even within it—has such a Till bestrode the stage of Symphony Hall. From the outset Mr. Koussevitzky was manifestly and unflaggingly in the vein; while at every turn and click of the tone-poem, to him the orchestra answered. The little introduction, taken slowly, phrased gently, touched the imagination. In the old story-books, musingly, Strauss was finding a hero. And what a hero! There he is in the music teetering, swanking, preening, piping. Nowhere has Strauss written measures of sharper, more instant, characterization—not even when he flings Don Juan upon his tonal stage.

Then to the japes, the clowneries—Till at the top of his bent, with the marketwomen, the priests, the doctors, "our best people" (and their wives); Till swaggering, cavorting, leering and mocking "all over the place." Within recollection, these pranks in tones have not been so clearly differentiated, sounded with keener zest and tang. The savor or the music was in Mr. Koussevitzky's nostrils. With an artful rhetoric, he distributed pauses and accents; quickened, stayed, shaded. At the trial, the listener heard the very dialogue of culprit and judges. Only with the hanging was Mr. Koussevitzky less vivid, even a little blurred. Perhaps he was looking forward to the epilogue. With a smile of irony on his lips he bade the orchestra sing it. . . .

And all this delineation, characterization, rhetoric of the tonal theater, while the web of the music was never broken and the formal progress—Strauss, in those days, loved such feats—never clouded. By common consent "Till Eulenspiegel" is a masterpiece of narration and characterization in tones. The gayety, élan, humor, even the pity of it, are well-nigh unapproachable. As music-making, according to all the prescriptions, it falls not a whit short. Genius abides in the tone-poem—and yesterday, upon an orchestra above itself, genius also played the measures.

H. T. P.

Globe
Dec. 13

NEW PIANIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Borovsky Plays Concerto by Tchaikovsky

Alexander Borovsky, a Russian pianist, formerly professor in the Moscow Conservatory, and of late years touring virtuoso, made his Boston debut yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert. He played Tchaikovsky's hackneyed concerto in B flat minor, instead of the Prokofieff originally announced. The fourth and final form of this week's Symphony program, as actually given, begins with Respighi's "Old Dances and Airs," and besides the Tchaikovsky concerto includes a Concerto Grosso for strings and piano, by Corelli, in which the piano part was played by Arthur Fiedler, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

One wishes Mr Koussevitzky could make up his mind two weeks in advance what each program is going to be and avoid such numerous and disconcerting changes. Many Symphony subscribers like to look over the music to be played, or to hear lectures on it beforehand. The newspapers wish to make announcements in advance. Program notes must be prepared and printed. Every other conductor for many years has made known his programs well in advance and deviated from the advance announcement only for reasons given. Koussevitzky has made at least one change in each of the eight programs so far offered in the regular series. With unlimited rehearsal time he ought to be able to try over pieces about which he has doubts before announcing them for performance.

One also wishes that no Symphony concert should be given without a symphony on the program, or a piece as long and as exacting as the average standard symphony.

These concerts should not become a "highbrow" series of Pops. Yet there is nothing but artistic conscience on the part of conductor, performers, reviewers and a portion of the audience that stands in the way. Most of the subscribers pay to hear the best music and leave it to those who should know to select that best. The musical leaders should not betray their trust.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of "Till Eulenspiegel" proves that he has a genius for comedy akin to that shown by his fellow countryman, Chaliapin, in such songs as Dargomizsky's "Government Clerk." He brought out every roguish turn of phrase, as the subtitle "nach alter Schelmenweise" exhorts conductors to do in "Till."

Muck used to remember that Strauss also put "in Rondoform" in his title. Koussevitzky thought more of the content than of the form of the piece. He remembered each point in the program note giving the details of the merry pranks, and made the orchestra emphasize it. This performance was one of the greatest dramatic and musical achievements of Koussevitzky here. The audience received it all in solemn silence. Very few people applauded. When will people be enough at home in our concert halls to dare to smile, even to chuckle?

The Corelli concerto and the old pieces for lute arranged by Respighi proved that Koussevitzky is more at home in 16th century music than in later old masters. Intensity, expressiveness, brilliant color, strong stresses do not suit 18th century music. Koussevitzky, who excels in these things, cannot make his excellence felt in music which denies him such opportunities. He obviously loves 18th century melodies, but 18th century polyphony does not seemingly strike him as a human and eloquent means of expression.

Borovsky proved a competent but not dazzling pianist. His Tchaikovsky was less eloquent than Koussevitzky's accompaniment.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Herald
Dec, 13

Makes Debut as Symphony Solois

The first soloist to be heard with th Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serg Koussevitzky this season, Alexande Borovsky, new Russian pianist, playe at yesterday afternoon's concert, which will be repeated tonight.

Mr. Borovsky made his American debut in New York last year. This is his first visit to Boston.

With the orchestra, he played Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto, in B-flat minor. It was a brilliant performance by both orchestra and soloist. Borovsky displayed complete technical mastery, and an unusual command of tone color. Some might have preferred to hear him in the ultra-modern music to which he is reputed to incline, but to the Friday afternoon audience the Tchaikovsky was entirely satisfying.

On the program Mr. Koussevitzky placed two other compositions requiring the piano as part of the orchestra. They were Respighi's arrangement of old dances and airs for the lute, and Corelli's Concerto Grosso in C minor. The Respighi arrangements were heard here last season under M. Monteux, with the exception of the first, the "Ballet of Count Orlando." In his free arrangement Respighi has retained all the antique charm of these old airs, and the conductor enhanced them by a graceful rendition. Mr. Bedetti, Mr. Burgin and Mr. Longy played the solo passages for 'cello, violin and oboe superlatively well. The program closed with a splendid performance of "Till Eulenspiegel," which proved that in Strauss also Mr. Koussevitzky finds free range for his powers and temper.

Symphony in Fund Concert

Serge Koussevitzky will present a Tchaikovsky program at the annual winter pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30.

The great Russian conductor will present the Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," serenade for strings, and the Fifth Symphony in E minor.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The ninth program by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be performed next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will have as soloists Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in three pieces for two pianos, a concerto of Emanuel Bach and two new scores then to have their first performance—a concerto of Arthur Bliss and a scherzo by E. B. Hill.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the concert with Haydn's symphony in G major (B & H, No. 13), and close it with Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

KEITH'S THEATRE

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT WORTH, TEXAS
TELEGRAM
DEC 14 1924

This season will witness a rivalry for conducting honors between Koussevitsky and Leopold Stokowski, the brilliant leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Stokowski's followers will unconsciously resist the heaping of plaudists upon the newcomer's head. They are loyal to their blond musician, and he can do no wrong.

All the same, Stokowski will not have quite so much of the limelight as he has heretofore. Koussevitsky is not alone a man who takes hold of one's music sensibilities; he is a personality. And such a reading as he gave Debussy's nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes. Their clarity, delicacy, transparency were of a quality I can not recall having heard before.

The Oberon overture seemed to be altogether too free . . . in both tempi and dynamics. But the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ was performed with nobility of the phrase line and a genuinely classic glory. Passing over Pacific 231 as impossible music, we come to the Scriabin Poem of Ecstasy. It is overlong and has some dry stretches; yet Koussevitzky extracted from it some real color.

The second program—which contained Brahms' fourth symphony—put the Russian visitor to a still severer test. At the outset it should be stated that it was a different interpretation than some of our recognized conductors favor. There was some dragging of the tempi in the passacaglia; there was less of that adherence to traditional markings elsewhere to which most of us are accustomed. Still the variations were not such as to offend seriously fair-minded symphony concert patrons. For Koussevitzky makes Brahms live.

Moussorgsky, Glinka and Prokofieff were the other composers represented on this second program, and the conductor was thoroughly at home with them.

Herald
Dec, 14

Alexander Borovsky

Pianist Plans Concerts of 18th and 20th Century Music

As fragments of Tschaikowsky's Fifth symphony filled the empty spaces of Symphony hall as Koussevizky and the orchestra rehearsed for the Sunday concert, Mr. Borovsky, awaiting his turn with the Tschaikowsky concerto, substituted at the last moment for that of his adored Prokofiev, the scores of which will not be printed for several months, compared himself to Busoni in the disruption of his original plans for this American visit.

A tall man, amiable, more meditative than loquacious, he has none of the mannerisms of the virtuoso; and he speaks English without great difficulty. He has no eagerness for a concert tour here; instead, he plans to give a cycle of concerts, combining 18th and 20th century music, in New York.

"They will be like those that I gave in Paris—they liked them. Every one plays music of the 19th century, some play only 18th century composers, some play music of a single composer; but no one has combined these two centuries on one program. It is different, and people like novelty. I divide each program into three parts. First, I play, perhaps, a sonata of Mozart—they are not long concerts—and I give them in a series of six; then I play Prokofiev, Malipiero, Faure, Hindesmith, de Falla, Stravinsky; and then I return to the 18th century, perhaps with Rameau; and after Stravinsky he is like a smile.

"I have included 15 of the 18th century composers and 25 of the 20th century—and only those that are typical of the time. That is why I do not include either Rachmaninoff or Cyril Scott—they are not characteristic of the 20th century.

"And these centuries are much alike. In Europe today no one plays Schumann. He is, perhaps, too near, like a father. They return to the grandfather. The 19th century was psychological; today we are more objective, more sturctural, as the 18th century was.

"You ask me if Stravinsky has influenced Prokofiev? No—Rachmaninoff has influenced Medtner, and Medtner has influenced Rachmaninoff—but such men as Prokofiev and Stravinsky are too individual to be influenced by each other. Stravinsky was little known in Russia; and each of them has developed alone, differently. Stravinsky plays only Scarlatti and Bach; Prokofiev plays Mozart. Each of them is great, but there is no influence."

Like Prokofiev, Borovsky studied first with his mother, a pupil of Safonov, who was at one time a conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society; again, like Prokonev, he was a pupil of the renowned Mme. Essipov, one of the many wives of Leschetizky, at the conservatory at Leningrad. And, as did Medtner and Prokofiev, as well as many others, he won the gold medal and the Rubinstein prize. At the Moscow conservatory his pupils were only the most advanced students, preparing for the concert hall. "I did not teach scales and exercises."

It was in 1921 that he stirred musical Paris as a pianist, in company with a 'cellist, at one of the Koussevitzky concerts, and since then he has played as a soloist with orchestras and in his own concerts in Leipzig, Munich, Prague, London, in South America, in Madrid, and last season at two recitals in Carnegie hall in New York. It was in Paris that he originated his 18th and 20th century programs; he gave concerts of music only by Prokofiev; he embraced all of the ultra moderns.

"Granados I do not play—he is too easy—he is only for pupils—but of modern composers I play Prokofiv, Scriabin, Medtner, Miasskowsky, Stravinsky, Malapiero, Sasella, Schoenberg, Hindesmith, Faure, Auric, Honegger, Milhaud, Roussel, Florent Schmitt, Poulenc, Bela Bartok; of the Spanish, Albenez and de Falla, and of the English only Arnold Bax and Ernest Bloch.

"No, I do not compose—I cannot waste my time—to compose it must be imperative—it is not so with me.

"Prokofiev will come here again—perhaps he was not what you call tactful when he was here before—America is so intense—every one must come here—and conditions are not good for the artist in Europe now."

Perhaps when Borovsky is in New York he will teach a little—"there are two excellent pianists, Russian emigres, whom I have promised"; then, after he has rounded out his cycle, he will return to London, Germany, and Paris, vigorously expounding his theories of the ultra-moderns, and of the 18th century.

The orchestra was still playing the fifth symphony, but it was the last movement now, and it would soon be time for the Tschaikowsky concerto; and, not at all suggesting the brilliant virtuoso that reports have him, he commented almost deprecatingly that "it must be very hard for the musician to play again on Saturday night after the critics have said bad things about him—but I do not care."

E. G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE
DEC 14 1924

Serge Koussevitzky.

You may like or dislike a conductor while first listening to his efforts and seeing him at work, but such impressions are not invariably final. One needs to sit through several programs, widely contrasted in their array of compositions, before reaching a conclusive estimate.

For all this I am tempted to go on record concerning Serge Koussevitsky after having attended two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he so recently led in this city. Nor am I alone in that decision. Koussevitsky surprised by the very absence of those sensational qualities—some of them visual—which he was expected to display.

He did not twist his body, or fling his arms wildly, or lean over the stand. He resorted to no mysterious motions of the left hand common to some prima donna conductors who dote on such help to move an assemblage. He was dignified, reposeful, authoritative. And he seemed thoroughly sincere.

Koussevitsky had drilled his musicians to sand-papered fineness. They were with him to the last man; and they played superbly, in point of tone, technique and shading. Perhaps I am a trifle too previous, yet I can not believe this Russian newcomer will show less on future appearances than he did on those two occasions in Carnegie Hall. It looks as though Boston has acquired a master-leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT WORTH, TEXAS
TELEGRAM
DEC 14 1924

You may like or dislike a conductor while first listening to his effects and seeing him at work, but such impressions are not invariably final. One needs to sit through several programs, widely contrasted in their array of compositions, before reaching a conclusive estimate.

For all this I am tempted to go on record concerning Serge Koussevistky after having attended two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which he recently led in this city. Nor am I alone in that decision. Koussevitsky surprised by the very absence of those sensational qualities—some of them visual—which he was expected to display.

He did not twist his body nor fling his arms wildly, nor lean over the stand. He resorted to no mysterious motions of the left hand common to some prima donna conductors who dote on such help to move an assemblage. He was dignified, reposeful, authoritative. And he seemed thoroughly sincere.

Koussevitsky had drilled his musicians to sandpapered fineness. They were with him to the last man; and they played superbly, in point of tone, technique and shading. Perhaps I am a trifle too previous, yet I can not believe this Russian newcomer will show less on future appearances than he did on those two occasions in Carnegie Hall. It looks as though Boston has acquired a master leader.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 14 1924

Music Notes Afield

THE illness of Serge Koussevitzky prevented his appearing at the conductor's desk at two concerts, Dec. 1 in Boston and Dec. 4 at Cambridge. There was no assistant conductor, therefore Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, substituted. The Boston Transcript said: "Had Mr. Koussevitzky been disabled for a week, a fortnight, a month, the whole scheme and the whole schedule of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, at home and abroad, would have been thrown into dire confusion. Moreover, it is not the music as music or the orchestra as orchestra that now sells every seat on every occasion in every city. It is the presence, the renown, the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, in play upon the imagination of the public. He is not rugged of body—and the climate of New England and New York in Winter and Spring is hard to bear. He has not the tranquil temperament that carried Mr. Monteux through five years of concerts—and not one missed. The peculiar virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky is his ceaseless nervous energy. To release it over a schedule of a hundred-odd concerts is to be ever on the verge of overwork.

"In these circumstances, the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra might reasonably and immediately consider the development or the engagement of an assistant conductor. Whether there are men of promise as such within the ranks of the band, an outsider may not easily say. In Dr. Muck's time it contained a serviceable substitute not ill received. Possibly a passable remplaçant now sits under Mr. Koussevitzky. Certainly, by the evidence of Monday, he is not Mr. Richard Burgin, able concertmaster though the violinist be. If the orchestra yields no promising aspirant, then an assistant conductor should be sought elsewhere. There are young Americans, ambitious of such a job for entrance to a career, who would profit much by work under Mr. Koussevitzky. There are young or middle-aged Europeans who would cut a caper at the opportunity. No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky himself would have suggestions, even choices. It would, indeed, be his right to choose. True, an assistant conductor would add another salary to the treasury; but that salary would be only additional price paid for Mr. Koussevitzky—and security. It is the custom to say that he and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, for the while, inseparable. If so, then an assistant conductor is the means wherewith to seal the bond."

Music Notes Afield

N.Y. Times—Dec. 14

THE illness of Serge Koussevitzky prevented his appearing at the conductor's desk at two concerts, Dec. 1 in Boston and Dec. 4 at Cambridge. There was no assistant conductor, therefore Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, substituted. The Boston Transcript said: "Had Mr. Koussevitzky been disabled for a week, a fortnight, a month, the whole scheme and the whole schedule of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, at home and abroad, would have been thrown into dire confusion. Moreover, it is not the music as music or the orchestra as orchestra that now sells every seat on every occasion in every city. It is the presence, the renown, the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, in play upon the imagination of the public. He is not rugged of body—and the climate of New England and New York in Winter and Spring is hard to bear. He has not the tranquil temperament that carried Mr. Monteux through five years of concerts—and not one missed. The peculiar virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky is his ceaseless nervous energy. To release it over a schedule of a hundred-odd concerts is to be ever on the verge of overwork.

"In these circumstances, the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra might reasonably and immediately consider the development or the engagement of an assistant conductor. Whether there are men of promise as such within the ranks of the band, an outsider may not easily say. In Dr. Muck's time it contained a serviceable substitute not ill received. Possibly a passable remplaçant now sits under Mr. Koussevitzky. Certainly, by the evidence of Monday, he is not Mr. Richard Burgin, able concertmaster though the violinist be. If the orchestra yields no promising aspirant, then an assistant conductor should be sought elsewhere. There are young Americans, ambitious of such a job for entrance to a career, who would profit much by work under Mr. Koussevitzky. There are young or middle-aged Europeans who would cut a caper at the opportunity. No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky himself would have suggestions, even choices. It would, indeed, be his right to choose. True, an assistant conductor would add another salary to the treasury; but that salary would be only additional price paid for Mr. Koussevitzky—and security. It is the custom to say that he and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, for the while, inseparable. If so, then an assistant conductor is the means wherewith to seal the bond."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 14 1924

227

Music Notes Afield

THE illness of Serge Koussevitzky prevented his appearing at the conductor's desk at two concerts, Dec. 1 in Boston and Dec. 4 at Cambridge. There was no assistant conductor, therefore Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, substituted. The Boston Transcript said: "Had Mr. Koussevitzky been disabled for a week, a fortnight, a month, the whole scheme and the whole schedule of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, at home and abroad, would have been thrown into dire confusion. Moreover, it is not the music as music or the orchestra as orchestra that now sells every seat on every occasion in every city. It is the presence, the renown, the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, in play upon the imagination of the public. He is not rugged of body—and the climate of New England and New York in Winter and Spring is hard to bear. He has not the tranquil temperament that carried Mr. Monteux through five years of concerts—and not one missed. The peculiar virtue of Mr. Koussevitzky is his ceaseless nervous energy. To release it over a schedule of a hundred-odd concerts is to be ever on the verge of overwork.

"In these circumstances, the trustees and the managers of the Symphony Orchestra might reasonably and immediately consider the development or the engagement of an assistant conductor. Whether there are men of promise as such within the ranks of the band, an outsider may not easily say. In Dr. Muck's time it contained a serviceable substitute not ill received. Possibly a passable remplaçant now sits under Mr. Koussevitzky. Certainly, by the evidence of Monday, he is not Mr. Richard Burgin, able concertmaster though the violinist be. If the orchestra yields no promising aspirant, then an assistant conductor should be sought elsewhere. There are young Americans, ambitious of such a job for entrance to a career, who would profit much by work under Mr. Koussevitzky. There are young or middle-aged Europeans who would cut a caper at the opportunity. No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky himself would have suggestions, even choices. It would, indeed, be his right to choose. True, an assistant conductor would add another salary to the treasury; but that salary would be only additional price paid for Mr. Koussevitzky—and security. It is the custom to say that he and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, for the while, inseparable. If so, then an assistant conductor is the means wherewith to seal the bond."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
DEC 14 1924

Everyone is looking forward to the annual visit of the Boston Symphony with its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. No newcomer to this country in recent years has attracted so much attention or has been so widely heralded. He appears to have lived up to all that had been said of him according to newspaper reports of his Boston and New York concerts.

Known as the most ultra of moderns, people had expected to see much gesticulating in his conducting but they were disappointed. Instead they saw a serious faced, dignified who conducted with a minimum of gesture and pose but who went direct to work to achieve his desires. He is said to be an excellent disciplinarian and to have his men in control.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 14 1924

Serge Koussevitzky has sent to Paris for the score of Honegger's opera "Roi David," which was one of the musical sensations of Paris during the last season. "Roi David" was written in 1922 in the space of two months and first given at the Théâtre de Jorat in Switzerland. Honegger rescored it for large concert orchestra. Excepting his symphony, it is the longest and most substantial composition he has produced. "Roi David" is scored for orchestra, chorus and solo voices. The text is taken from the Psalms, parts of the Old Testament and other sources.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

"Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his local début last evening in Carnegie Hall where the Bostonians gave their first concert of the season. Every number on the program was interpreted and played with the minutest attention to detail—phrasing, tonal balance, polish, clarity, expression—and the enthusiasm of the audience increased as the concert proceeded. There were fine-spun pianissimos, scarcely audible, and sonorous climaxes; there were 'readings' that differed from those to which the ear has been accustomed; there were tempi that all would not agree with, but none would deny the conductor's sincerity. His interpretations were of music as he felt it."—Evening World, November 28.

"Mr. Rachmaninoff put into Liszt's music a laconic mastery by which it seemed, at moments, transfigured; as if, indeed, the living artist endowed it with a beauty, a sincerity not shown outwardly, but subtly conveyed by the spirit of the playing.

"An audience enthralled followed the later Chopin pieces and a group by Rachmaninoff himself—including the G major and G flat major preludes—with a finale, the Strauss-Godowsky 'Artist's Life' waltz, which was the signal for vociferous and prolonged recalls."—New York Times.

Second in a Series of Five

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS

by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(104 MUSICIANS)

Sergei Rachmaninoff, Pianist

Soloist

Friday Evening, January 2

at 8:15 o'clock

PROGRAM

Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10.....Handel
- Overture
- Allegro
- Air
- Allegro moderato

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned, Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form," Op. 28 .....Strauss

Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op. 18, for Pianoforte with Orchestra .....Rachmaninoff
- Moderato
- Adagio sostenuto
- Allegro scherzando

Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer") .....De Falla

(Piano, Jesús Sanromá)

Introduction and Scene—The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Pantomime—Ritual Dance of Fire (To dispel Evil Spirits)

"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem.....Ravel

Opera House — Academy of Music

Remaining Dates and Soloists

Jan. 30— } Roland Hayes, Tenor
Mar. 13— } Albert Spalding, Violin
April 10— }

Remaining Tickets for the Second Concert now on Sale, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.25; Boxes, $1.75, $2.25, $2.50.

NO WAR TAX

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 14 1924

Serge Koussevitsky has sent to Paris for the score of Honegger's opera "Roi David," which was one of the musical sensations of Paris during the last season. "Roi David" was written in 1922 in the space of two months and first given at the Théâtre de Jorat in Switzerland. Honegger rescored it for large concert orchestra. Excepting his symphony, it is the longest and most substantial composition he has produced. "Roi David" is scored for orchestra, chorus and solo voices. The text is taken from the Psalms, parts of the Old Testament and other sources.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
DEC 14 1924

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, will be the assisting artist at the second of the annual Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on Friday evening, Jan. 2, at the Academy of Music.

Sunday Symphonic Society,

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
RECORD
DEC 15 1924

LI'L OLD NEW YORK

New York—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
DEC 15 1924

deep

* * *

The comparison with the Boston Symphony is a trifle misleading because, after all, the Guild plays will probably always move out onto Broadway in due course, just as "The Guardsman" has been pushed uptown to the Booth by the arrival of "They Knew What They Wanted," which in turn must give way early next month to the production of "Processional." But if you ever try to attend the plays when they are new at the Guild Theater and should find yourself thwarted at its threshold you will have to admit that 'way back in the uncomplicated days of 1924 you were fully warned by a quaint old fellow to whom no one ever did pay much attention anyway.

* * *

Transcript
Dec, 15

Incidents and Prospects

The expected will befall. On the la day of November, in New York, Mr. Kouss itzky led the Boston Symphony Orchest through "Clouds" and "Fêtes"—Nocturn of Debussy—and loud was the applause all within earshot. On Friday and Satu day, Dec. 5 and 6, Mr. Stokowski led t Philadelphia Orchestra through thos Nocturnes in its own city. On Tuesd evening next, he will repeat them in Ne

Transcript
dec, 15

"ALL-CHAIKOVSKY," MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, THRILLS, TEDIUMS

MUSIC AND MONEY AID THE FUND FOR PENSIONS

"Francesca da Rimini" After Fifteen Years with Only a Clarinet-Tune to Save It—Fragments from a Pleasing Serenade—The Fifth Symphony for Composer's Masterpiece, Conductor Fired and Audience Possessed—The Matter and the Manner

ONE-MAN programs, as the awkward phrase goes, haunt the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund. Year after year, Wagner has served the turn; filled Symphony Hall; restored a needy and deserving treasury. An afternoon of an evening of Beethoven solus, the public likes not so well; while two hours of Strauss have not always loosened its fingers at the box-office. No more will a discreet mixture of Strauss and Chaikovsky—once tried by Mr. Monteux—do the trick; while "All-Chaikovsky" (as another clumsy phrase runs) is less dependable than "All-Wagner." Even the "Pathetic Symphony" has ceased of late years to be "a stronghold sure." Nevertheless, and with reason, Mr. Koussevitzky renewed the venture at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. "All-Chaikovsky" was the program; but "The Pathetic"—Heaven be praised!—stood not upon it. A far more measured, masterful, persisting music—the Symphony in E minor, Number Five—filled half the concert. The other half fell to the Fantasia (or tone-poem) "Francesca da Rimini," unheard hereabouts these many years, and to the Elegy and the slow Waltz from the Serenade for Strings. "All-Chaikovsky," indeed, but "All-Chaikovsky" distinctly diversified and freshened. Add the wide and just fame of Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor in such music, the curiosity over him as newcomer, and there was every reason to expect a full house. Full it virtually was; but after effort on the part of the management; while even so, the profitable "standees" were lacking. The Pension Fund increased; but Wagner still remains the only insurance.

As the event proved, the Fantasia of Francesca might have been spared, were it not that audiences at occasional symphony concerts expect two hours of music. On Friday and Saturday at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Borovsky, Chaikovsky's fifty-year-old Piano-Concerto was still living and breathing music. Within the hour, his Fifth Symphony was to sound at the conductor's hands, unwithered and undimmed. Yet since the ill-starred day in which Mr. Monteux revived the other Fantasia of Romeo and Juliet, music of Chaikovsky has not seemed so null, void and ineffectual. With reason has "Francesca" fallen through fifteen seasons from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts. . . . The scheme of the tone-poem, "after Dante," is simple and obvious: Hades and the circle of the lovers damned; the ghosts upon the whipping winds, the torment and the pangs; Francesca and Paolo embraced and remembering, in torture and in felicity:

Nessun maggior dolore
Che ricordarsi del tempo felice
Nella miseria

Hades again—the winds, the dark, they that for love had sinned, whirled through the shadows.

Everlasting matter for music; but by Chaikovsky clothed in measures, now become, for the most part, shrivelled and impotent. Through long, long pages, the orchestra seethes in tumult and torment, after the manner of the romantical seventies, Russian style. If we listeners of 1924 are to believe the extolling annotators of the nineties, "it laments and shudders"; "spasm follows spasm"; between are "awful silences." Yet upon many a hearing ear fell only tonal sound and fury, signifying more of the overwrought and overtaxed composer than of infernal circle and lovers doomed. (The nineteenth-century romantics could evoke them in music. The first division of Liszt's "Dante Symphony" is the lasting proof.) At length the climax and the pause. Then the song of the clarinet—and Mr. Sand was a little master—over the muted strings, by the flutes soon aided for Francesca speaking: "No sharper pang than happiness in misery remembered."

Composer has yet to write music that shall echo—much more intensify—Dante's verses; that shall glow and bleed with Francesca's passion and her pain—she who loved and remembered, who remembered and loved again; "the lily in the mouth of Tartarus" upon whom all the theologians' hells may not prevail. It is hard to say whether Liszt's or Chaikovsky's music falls the further short of heights unattainable. Yet nowadays this song for the clarinet endures, arrests and illudes beyond all else in the Fantasia. In it beauty, and poignancy, and, in degree, evocation, still dwell. To it, moreover, Mr. Koussevitsky and Mr. Sand, gave a strange and singular quality—unearthly, eerie, of a phantom-music threading the air. Feat, indeed, of imagination, seldom done upon these measures, continuing when English horn and harp first quiver with the bliss remembered.

Soon, however, Chaikovsky too sweetish for twentieth-century palates. Then—and ten-fold the pity—Hades again, peopled by all the platitudes, twisting and tumbling emptily. At will and need, no less does music of this day thrash in and out and roundabout. As likely as not, if any is heard in 1974, it will seem the dry bones of fleshless tonal skeletons. To every generation, its own way with such pages, and Chaikovsky's is now the way to impotence and tedium. Does Mr. Koussevitsky, with all his devotion, half suspect as much? Not before in Boston has he so labored his points, so plied and strained his conductor's rhetoric. Better far, and much the more engaging, the Chaikovsky of the Serenade—fanciful and beguiling in the slow Waltz; not too tearful with the musings of melancholy; audibly Italianate after the manner of his lighter pieces. In Petersburg he could hear Florence, even as Rimsky heard Seville—and also Baghdad. Besides, Mr. Koussevitsky played artfully and fancifully upon pace and rhythm in the Waltz; while in the Elegy, sensuous upon the ear were the rich and pulsing sonorities of the singing choir.

Down the winds to oblivion drifts "Francesca." Yet the Fifth Symphony still rides and masters them. Here surely is Chaikovsky's symphonic masterpiece—music as yet that time and change may not dull or pale or wither. Neither in the Symphony of Fate that preceded it, nor in "The Pathetic" that followed it, is to be so free from the infirmities and the excesses of his temperament, practice, procedure. Here he writes drama in tones his invention flows and is fertile; whil sure is his hand and quick his imagina tion upon structure and progress. Th Concerto in B-flat minor, heard on Frida and Saturday, is still a vital and viv music. The Symphony in E minor, heard yesterday, remains a music to po sess, enthrall and transport the heare Far below its deserts has the piece far these ten years in Boston. Chaikovs baffled Dr. Muck, who believed he half disclosed the Russian's music. Si Mr. Rabaud was an academic Parisian, was not upon his calling list. Mr. Monte played it studiously and dutifully, witho blood or fire. Both he and Dr. Muc were fain to take refuge in "The Pathetic because it pleased the people; or in t Fourth because the Scherzo for the pluck strings was sure to get many hands.

Hence has the Fifth gone neglected Symphony Hall until Mr. Koussevitzky ye terday revived it—superbly, magnificentl superlatively. The music, in and for i self, warranted such revival. Hauntin upon the introduction is the sombre them —Fate muffled, waiting, padding in th wainscot, the Fate of Defeat perhaps; fo when Chaikovsky began the Symphony h believed, had been cruelly told, that he wa past his prime. Bravely he re-asserts him self through the first movement. The mo tifs unfold and in them are life and savo The workmanship is alert and abundan Developed, the music mounts and warms Through it courses emotion. Only a litt too lush and sweet, too much of th strings, too moist upon the ear, are th measures of sustained melody. Yet the n tion of defeat still haunts Chaikovsk Wearily he ends, as one who has trie and failed.

Yet once more, and now to the utmost From the first horn above the string sounds the pervading melody of the An dante—Chaikovsky's invention of inven tions in instrumental song. There others, as it were to second it. Time an again, it returns and a music, otherwis over-long, teems with this coördinate beauty of songful sound, this glow and bea and flood of feeling transmuted. Once mo the "defeatist" in Chaikovsky will not ha it so. Once, twice, in thrusts that waitin motiv, shouting at him and stampin Chaikovsky's hand falters; his hea droops; the music shuts its lips. . . . Th notion haunts the little Waltz that is Scherzo. Always it is a timed music— sensuous ghost. Once at least the "d featist" motiv muffles, almost smothers Then, as it were, Chaikovsky looks bac ward; hears in the ear of imagination much of the Symphony as is written. "Pa his prime, played out"—and the vigors of the Allegro, the beauty of the Andante, th wistful charm of the Scherzo-Waltz, s within him. "Defeated"—by the throat the plucks that pursuing theme of fate, strangles and transforms it. The Finale has scarcely begun before it is a major melody Soon it is full-bodied, full-blooded, alight and aflame. Upward it bounds, and a theme from the Allegro spurs it. Onward it strides, and the melody of the Andante companions strength with beauty. Full throated and radiant outpours the climax. "Defeated"—out of defeat itself has Chaikovsky snatched the victory. In Strauss himself imagination and expression hardly go in closer clasp.

With the music, above the music, soared the performance. Mr. Koussevitsky, who—could rescue a masterpiece in kind from Bostonian oblivion and served; as one to whom Chaikovsky was "dear." Chaikovsky of Rimsky's familiar sayings of Stravinsky's more recent praise; as one to whom the music was drama; in itself, besides, of a power and a beauty ever new, ever strange, like the face of Beauty upon youth, or the face of Beauty upon this wrinkled western world. An orchestra strung to the utmost pitch gave him back his askings. Mr. Wendler, Mr. Sand, Mr. Laurent, Mr. Ritter—who did not distinguish himself? The Theme of Defeat haunted the ear as it haunts the music. Adroitly, Mr. Koussevitzky diff rentiated the moods; ardently he heightened the vigors of the first movement. Like bed of glowing coals was the orchestral tone in the Andante. Astute was Mr. Koussevitzky that this songful beauty should sa ur- ut not cloy. The Scherzo-Waltz was a marvel of delicate pointing. The Finale was the sun of Chaikovsky in high heaven running course. An audience transported shook off its possession, volleyed, even shouted, its plaudits. Since that first afternoon of Wagner plus Dr. Muck there has been no such concert for the Pension Fund.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

228

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

"Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his local début last evening in Carnegie Hall where the Bostonians gave their first concert of the season. Every number on the program was interpreted and played with the minutest attention to detail—phrasing, tonal balance, polish, clarity, expression—and the enthusiasm of the audience increased as the concert proceeded. There were fine-spun pianissimos, scarcely audible, and sonorous climaxes; there were 'readings' that differed from those to which the ear has been accustomed; there were tempi that all would not agree with, but none would deny the conductor's sincerity. His interpretations were of music as he felt it."—Evening World, November 28.

"Mr. Rachmaninoff put into Liszt's music a laconic mastery by which it seemed, at moments, transfigured; as if, indeed, the living artist endowed it with a beauty, a sincerity not shown outwardly, but subtly conveyed by the spirit of the playing.

"An audience enthralled followed the later Chopin pieces and a group by Rachmaninoff himself—including the G major and G flat major preludes—with a finale, the Strauss-Godowsky 'Artist's Life' waltz, which was the signal for vociferous and prolonged recalls."—New York Times.

Second in a Series of Five
PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS
by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(104 MUSICIANS)

PROGRAM

Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10 ..Handel
Overture
Allegro
Air
Allegro moderato

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned, Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form," Op. 28 .....Strauss

Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op. 18, for Pianoforte with Orchestra .....Rachmaninoff
Moderato
Adagio sostenuto
Allegro scherzando

Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer") .....De Falla
(Piano, Jesús Sanromá)

Introduction and Scene The "Gypsies" (Evening)—The Returning Spirit—Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Pantomime—Ritual Dance of Fire (To dispel Evil Spirits)

"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem.....Ravel

Sergei Rachmaninoff, Pianist
Soloist

Friday Evening, January 2
at 8:15 o'clock

Opera House Academy of Music

Remaining Dates and Soloists

Jan. 30— } Roland Hayes, Tenor
Mar. 13— } Albert Spalding, Violin
April 10— }

Remaining Tickets for the Second Concert now on Sale, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.25; Boxes, $1.75, $2.25, $2.50.

NO WAR TAX

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 14 1924

Serge Koussevitsky has sent to Paris for the score of Honegger's opera "Roi David," which was one of the musical sensations of Paris during the last season. "Roi David" was written in 1922 in the space of two months and first given at the Théâtre de Jorat in Switzerland. Honegger rescored it for large concert orchestra. Excepting his symphony, it is the longest and most substantial composition he has produced. "Roi David" is scored for orchestra, chorus and solo voices. The text is taken from the Psalms, parts of the Old Testament and other sources.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
DEC 14 1924

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, will be the assisting artist at the second of the annual Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on Friday evening, Jan. 2, at the Academy of Music.

The Sunday Symphonic Society, ... monthly

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
RECORD
DEC 15 1924

LI'L OLD NEW YORK

New York—A battle of batons is on in Gotham. Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, is threatening the crown of Leopold Stokowski as the idol of the fair ladies who make orchestra music profitable.

Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra for several years have held front place with New York's music lovers, especially the ladies. The Boston orchestra has been pretty much out of the social picture here since Dr. Karl Muck became a war prisoner.

But Koussevitsky is a tall, slim, handsome man and an impeccable dresser. In that respect he is much like Stokowski. And those who have followed the career of Stokowski since his Cincinnati days will tell you that his subjugation of audiences has been brought about as much by his appearance as by his musicianship.

New York has its own great conductors—Mengelburg, Van Hoogstraten, Hadley, Furtwangler and Igor Stravinsky, the composer, with the Philharmonic, and Damrosch, Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschman with the symphony. However, the battle for the pinnacle of public favor seems to rest between the visitors, Stokowski and Koussevitsky.

And may the better pair of spats win!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
DEC 15 1924

deep

* * *

The comparison with the Boston Symphony is a trifle misleading because, after all, the Guild plays will probably always move out onto Broadway in due course, just as "The Guardsman" has been pushed uptown to the Booth by the arrival of "They Knew What They Wanted," which in turn must give way early next month to the production of "Processional." But if you ever try to attend the plays when they are new at the Guild Theater and should find yourself thwarted at its threshold you will have to admit that 'way back in the uncomplicated days of 1924 you were fully warned by a quaint old fellow to whom no one ever did pay much attention anyway.

* * *

Transcript
Dec. 15

Incidents and Prospects

The expected will befall. On the la... day of November, in New York, Mr. Kouss...itzky led the Boston Symphony Orchest... through "Clouds" and "Fêtes"—Nocturn... of Debussy—and loud was the applause ... all within earshot. On Friday and Satu... day, Dec. 5 and 6, Mr. Stokowski led t... Philadelphia Orchestra through thos... a... Nocturnes in its own city. On Tuesd... evening next, he will repeat them in Ne...

Transcript
Dec. 15

"ALL-CHAIKOVSKY," MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, THRILLS, TEDIUMS

MUSIC AND MONEY AID THE FUND FOR PENSIONS

"Francesca da Rimini" After Fifteen Years with Only a Clarinet-Tune to Save It—Fragments from a Pleasing Serenade—The Fifth Symphony for Composer's Masterpiece, Conductor Fired and Audience Possessed—The Matter and the Manner

ONE-MAN programs, as the awkward phrase goes, haunt the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund. Year after year, Wagner has served the turn; filled Symphony Hall; restored a needy and deserving treasury. An afternoo... evening of Beethoven solus, the public likes not so well; while two hours of Strauss have not always loosened its fingers at the box-office. No more will a discreet mixture of Strauss and Chaikovsk—one tried by Mr. Monteux—do the trick; while "All-Chaikovsky" (as another clumsy phrase runs) is less dependable than "All-Wagner." Even the "Pathetic Symphony" has ceased of late years to be "a stronghold sure." Nevertheless, and with reason, Mr. Koussevitzky renewed the venture at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. "All-Chaikovsky" was the program; but "The Pathetic"—Heaven be praised!—stood not upon it. A far more measured, masterful, persisting music—the Symphony in E minor, Number Five—filled half the concert. The other half fell to the Fantasia (or tone-poem) "Francesca da Rimini," unheard hereabouts these many years, and to the Elegy and the slow Waltz from the Serenade for Strings. "All-Chaikovsky," indeed, but "All-Chaikovsky" distinctly diversified and freshened. Add the wide and just fame of Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor in such music, the curiosity over him as newcomer, and there was every reason to expect a full house. Full it virtually was; but after effort on the part of the management; while even so, the profitable "standees" were lacking. The Pension Fund increased; but Wagner still remains the only insurance.

As the event proved, the Fantasia of Francesca might have been spared, were it not that audiences at occasional symphony concerts expect two hours of music. On Friday and Saturday at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Borovsky, Chaikovsky's fifty-year-old Piano-Concerto was still living and breathing music. Within the hour, his Fifth Symphony was to sound at the conductor's hands, unwithered and undimmed. Yet since the ill-starred day in which Mr. Monteux revived the other Fantasia of Romeo and Juliet, music of Chaikovsky has not seemed so null, void and ineffectual. With reason has "Francesca" fallen through fifteen seasons from the repertory of the Symphony Concerts. . . . The scheme of the tone-poem, "after Dante," is simple and obvious: Hades and the circle of the lovers damned; the ghosts upon the whipping winds, the torment and the pangs; Francesca and Paolo embraced and remembering, in torture and in felicity:

Nessun maggior dolore
Che ricordarsi del tempo felice
Nella miseria

Hades again—the winds, the dark, they that for love had sinned, whirled through the shadows.

Everlasting matter for music; but by Chaikovsky clothed in measures, now become, for the most part, shrivelled and impotent. Through long, long pages, the orchestra seethes in tumult and torment, after the manner of the romantical seventies, Russian style. If we listeners of 1924 are to believe the extolling annotators of the nineties, "it laments and shudders"; "spasm follows spasm"; between are "awful silences." Yet upon many a hearing ear fell only tonal sound and fury, signifying more of the overwrought and overtaxed composer than of infernal circle and lovers doomed. (The nineteenth-century romantics could evoke them in music. The first division of Liszt's "Dante Symphony" is the lasting proof.). At length, the climax and the pause. Then the song of the clarinet—and Mr. Sand was a little master—over the muted strings, by the flutes soon aided for Francesca speaking: "No sharper pang than happiness in misery remembered."

Composer has yet to write music that shall echo—much more intensify—Dante's verses; that shall glow and bleed with Francesca's passion and her pain—she who loved and remembered, who remembered and loved again; "the lily in the mouth of Tartarus" upon whom all the theologians' hells may not prevail. It is hard to say whether Liszt's or Chaikovsky's music falls the further short of heights unattainable. Yet nowadays this song for the clarinet endures, arrests and illudes beyond all else in the Fantasia. In it beauty, and poignancy, and, in degree, evocation, still dwell. To it, moreover, Mr. Koussevitsky and Mr. Sand, gave a strange and singular quality—unearthly, eerie, of a phantom-music threading the air. Feat, indeed, of imagination, seldom done upon these measures, continuing when English horn and harp first quiver with the bliss remembered.

Soon, however, Chaikovsky too sweetish for twentieth-century palates. Then—and ten-fold the pity—Hades again, peopled by all the platitudes, twisting and tumbling emptily. At will and need, no less does music of this day thrash in and out and roundabout. As likely as not, if any is heard in 1974, it will seem the dry bones of fleshless tonal skeletons. To every generation, its own way with such pages, and Chaikovsky's is now the way to impotence and tedium. Does Mr. Koussevitsky, with all his devotion, half suspect as much? Not before in Boston has he so labored his points, so plied and strained his conductor's rhetoric. Better far, and much the more engaging, the Chaikovsky of the Serenade—fanciful and beguiling in the slow Waltz; not too tearful with the musings of melancholy; audibly Italianate after the manner of his lighter pieces. In Petersburg he could hear Florence, even as Rimsky heard Seville—and also Baghdad. Besides, Mr. Koussevitzky played artfully and fancifully upon pace and rhythm in the Waltz; while in the Elegy, sensuous upon the ear were the rich and pulsing sonorities of the singing choir.

Down the winds to oblivion drifts "Francesca." Yet the Fifth Symphony still rides and masters them. Here surely is Chaikovsky's symphonic masterpiece—music as yet that time and change may not dull or pale or wither. Neither in the Symphony of Fate that preceded it, nor in "The Pathetic" that followed it, is to be so free from the infirmities and the excesses of his temperament, practice, procedure. Here he writes drama in tones; his invention flows and is fertile; whilsure is his hand and quick his imagination upon structure and progress. The Concerto in B-flat minor, heard on Friday and Saturday, is still a vital and viv... music. The Symphony in E minor, heard yesterday, remains a music to possess, enthrall and transport the heare... Far below its deserts has the piece far... these ten years in Boston. Chaikovs... baffled Dr. Muck, who believed he ... half disclosed the Russian's music. Si... Mr. Rabaud was an academic Parisian, ... was not upon his calling list. Mr. Monte... played it studiously and dutifully, witho... blood or fire. Both he and Dr. Muc... were fain to take refuge in "The Pathetic... because it pleased the people; or in t... Fourth because the Scherzo for the pluck... strings was sure to get many hands.

Hence has the Fifth gone neglected ... Symphony Hall until Mr. Koussevitzky yes... terday revived it—superbly, magnificently, superlatively. The music, in and for itself, warranted such revival. Hauntin... upon the introduction is the sombre them... —Fate muffled, waiting, padding in th... wainscot, the Fate of Defeat perhaps; for... when Chaikovsky began the Symphony h... believed, had been cruelly told, that he wa... past his prime. Bravely he re-asserts him... self through the first movement. The mo... tivs unfold and in them are life and savo... The workmanship is alert and abundan... Developed, the music mounts and warms... Through it courses emotion. Only a litt... too lush and sweet, too much of th... strings, too moist upon the ear, are th... measures of sustained melody. Yet the n... tion of defeat still haunts Chaikovsk... Wearily he ends, as one who has trie... and failed.

Yet once more, and now to the utmost... From the first horn above the string... sounds the pervading melody of the An... dante—Chaikovsky's invention of inven... tions in instrumental song. There ... others, as it were to second it. Time an... again, it returns and a music, otherwis... over-long, teems with this coördinate... beauty of songful sound, this glow and be... and flood of feeling transmuted. Once mo... the "defeatist" in Chaikovsky will not ha... it so. Once, twice, in thrusts that waitin... motiv, shouting at him and stamping... Chaikovsky's hand falters; his hea... droops; the music shuts its lips. . . . T... notion haunts the little Waltz that is ... Scherzo. Always it is a timed music—... sensuous ghost. Once at least the "d... featist" motiv muffles, almost smothers i...

Then, as it were, Chaikovsky looks bac... ward; hears in the ear of imagination ... much of the Symphony as is written. "Pa... his prime, played out"—and the v goes ... the Allegro, the beauty of the Andante, t... wistful charm of the Scherzo-Waltz, s... within him. "Defeated"—by the throat ... plucks that pursuing theme of fate, strangles and transforms it. The Finale has scarcely begun before it is a major melody. Soon it is full-bodied, full-blooded, alight and aflame. Upward it bounds, and a theme from the Allegro spurs it. Onward it strides, and the melody of the Andante companions strength with beauty. Full-throated and radiant outpours the climax. "Defeated"—out of defeat itself has Chaikovsky snatched the victory. In Strauss himself imagination and expression hardly go in closer clasp.

With the music, above the music, soar... the performance. Mr. Koussevitzky w... as one who would rescue a masterpie... in kind from Bostonian oblivion and ... served; as one to whom Chaikovsky w... "our" Chaikovsky of Rimsky's familia... saying, of Stravinsky's more recent praise; as one to whom the music was drama; in itself, besides, of a power and beauty ever new, ever strange, like the face of romance upon youth, or the face of Russia upon this wrinkled western world. An orchestra strung to the utmost pitch gave him back his askings. Mr. Wendler, Mr. Sand, Mr. Laurent, Mr. Ritter—who did not distinguish himself? The Theme of Defeat haunted the ear as it haunts the music. Adroitly, Mr. Koussevitzky diff re tiated the moods; ardently he heightened the vigors of the first movement. Like bed of glowing coals was the orchestral tone in the Andante. Astute was Mr. Koussevitzky that this songful beauty should sa ur te but not cloy. The Scherzo-Waltz was a marvel of delicate pointing. The Finale was the sun of Chaikovsky in high heaven running course. An audience transported shook off its possession, volleyed, even shouted, its plaudits. Since that first afternoon of Wagner plus Dr. Muck there has been no such concert for the Pension Fund.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Vogue
New York City
DEC 15 1924

IT seems unbelievable to concert and opera goers of to-day that his Titanic majesty, the conductor, was once only "the gentleman who beats time." And this species of human metronome did not even face his band; he faced the audience! The modern public has come more and more to demand "personality" from the man who conducts an orchestra. He now faces his men as a matter of course, save when the exigencies of interpretation send him swaying this way and that, like a sunflower or a hollyhock caught in a hurricane, till his silhouette stands almost in profile against whatever background may be behind him. So far has he deviated from the mere time beating of a century ago that now he often visually "dramatizes" the music for his eager and expectant audience.

As one commentator—a conductor himself—has remarked, "By the skilful manipulation of his arms and hands, his hips and his hair, he gives the impression that when the cellos play a soulful melody, it really drips from his wrists, and when the kettle-drums play a dramatic roll, it is really the result of a flash of his eye." Inevitably, the question has been asked, "Out of all the swooning hosts that bow in rapt worship at the feet of the erudite Herr Pumpernickel, as with subtle wizardry he waves his wand over the symphonic aggregation from Nineveh on the Styx, how many could really distinguish their divinity from the gracious Signor Ravioli of the West Ravenna Philharmonic if a screen ample enough to shut off entirely his embattled gestures interposed between their eyes and their idol?"

CONCERNING THE CONDUCTOR

There actually are jokers who have the unfeeling audacity to propose that every orchestra, be it opera, symphonic, or Paul Whiteman's palpitating "jazz" should, Bayreuth fashion, play sunken out of the range of vision of its hearers—a sovereign method, one would say, of getting rid forever of the hearers! But audiences are not quite such an easy proposition as some jesters would have us think. They, after all, are the court of last appeal.

All of which is introductory to a prediction that the music season of 1924-25 in America will not echo through the ages with the name of a Caruso, a Mary Garden, a Maria Jeritza attached, but will be known as the season of those crowned and annointed prime donne of the baton, the orchestral conductors.

In the first place, four of the season's officiating conductors are strange to us of America. Sergei Koussevitzky, out of Russia by way of Paris and London, has come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and immediately set things humming by conducting for the first time in this country, at his opening concert with that admired band, the "Pacific 231" of Arthur Honegger, which, a little later, Walter Damrosch introduced to New York at a concert of the New York Symphony. "Pacific 231," by the way, can not help being a featured novelty of the season. Here, the most prominent of the new generation of French composers (Honegger is in his early thirties) pays his respects to the giant modern railway locomotive as it booms at top speed through the night, tugging a thunderous train of Pullmans in its mighty wake.

Mr. Koussevitzky is undeniably a sensational conductor, but there is no reproach in that. He began his career as a virtuoso performer on the bass viol, instead of going in, like less venturesome men, for the smaller and more manageable cello. That was sensational at the getaway!

During the last few years, as a voluntary exile from Russia, in Paris, in London, and now in America, he has turned to conducting orchestras, with results that have kept curiosity and interest at a boiling-point wherever he has appeared. His programs, never trite or stodgy, have been steadily notable for the number of modern works, especially Russian or French, that he has been the first to bring out.

Another Russian who will conduct here shortly—and there is no question about his being a sensation—is Igor Stravinsky. We now know Stravinsky as the most widely discussed of living composers, the man who has given the world those remarkable ballets, "L'Oiseau de Feu," 'Pétrouchka," and "Le Sacre du Printemps," besides many other startling works. It is only lately that he has conducted at all or played the piano in public. But, here, he will conduct as "guest" the New York Philharmonic and, with that and other orchestras, will play his recently composed piano concerto, which, on the occasion of its initial performance last spring, set Paris literally by the ears.

The New York Philharmonic offers still another "guest" conductor of a diametrically opposed type in Wilhelm Furtwaengler, one of the most distinguished of the younger orchestral leaders of Germany, who comes to us as the heritor of the great German conductors of the classic tradition. It naturally means much to Americans with a memory that Herr Furtwaengler happens to be the successor of the incomparable Arthur Nikisch as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipzig.

The New York Symphony has again as its "guests" Bruno Walter, of Munich, who has already made a solid place for himself with American audiences, and the young Russo-Frenchman, Vladimir Golschmann, who has a larger opportunity to display his youthful abilities this season than he had at a single concert last spring. Besides the various conducting "guests" and one brand-new "regular" leader in Mr. Koussevitzky, New York and other American cities can boast various symphonic leaders whose tenure is not transient. One has but to think of Walter Damrosch, Willem Mengelberg, and Josef Stransky in New York; of Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Frederick Stock in Chicago, Ossip Gabrilowitsch in Detroit, and Nikolai Sokoloff in Cleveland, and these men are only the most conspicuous of the guild through length of service or importance of achievement.

PENSION CONCERT SUPERB

Post Dais

Koussevitzky and His Band at Height of Powers 3

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Those who yesterday afternoon heard Mr. Koussevitzky lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its Pension Fund Concert heard conductor and orchestra at the height of their powers and in a programme that permitted the fullest and most brilliant exercise of Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristic abilities.

WISDOM IN CHOICE

From the music of Tchaikovsky came this programme, and it comprised the tone-poem "Francesca da Rimini," the Elegy and Waltz from the Serenade for Strings, and, lastly, the striding, opulent Fifth Symphony.

Since "Francesca da Rimini" had gone unheard at the Symphony Concerts for many a year, and since neither Serenade nor Symphony has been often played here of late, it seems safe to assume that yesterday's large audience had gathered to hear Mr. Koussevitzky quite as much as to hear this none too familiar music of Tchaikovsky. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky's wisdom in the choice of these pieces was made fully apparent before the afternoon was done.

Tone Poem Gripping

In the hands of a lesser conductor "Francesca da Rimini" may easily seem today no more than a half-successful effort to reproduce in tones one of the most affecting episodes in all literature. And not even Mr. Koussevitzky could redeem the blatancy of those measures wherein Tchaikovsky, striving to suggest the awesome fury of the winds of Hell, resorts to snorting brass, thumping drum and crashing cymbals a la Rossini. Yet for the rest these sections of the tone-poem seemed as they passed singularly graphic, gripping and suggestive; the episodes of Francesca's narrative had an irresistible poignancy; and truly harrowing, truly wracking were the final chords—the very choice of unutterable woe.

The two movements from the Serenade neither asked nor gave opportunity for a like miracle of re-creation. Rather there was here only a pervasive and persuasive loveliness of orchestral tone, the rarest beauty of phrasing, shading and accent.

A Master Guiding Hand

Finally, the performance of the Symphony was, on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky, a veritable tour de force. In the all but commonplace Andante, where a conductor less fine-grained would gild the lily of Tchaikovskian sentimentality, Mr. Koussevitzky ennobled the music, yet with no sacrifice of its perfervid emotionalism. In turn, in bewitching grace and lightness went the ensuing Waltz; while the first movement and the Finale alike because in Mr. Koussevitzky's hands extraordinarily dramatic.

Between the movements of the Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky, as is his custom, forbade intruding applause. Small wonder then that, freshly stimulated by the mounting climaxes of the close, it should at the end have burst forth with such warmth, such hearty fer- [illegible] Once again Mr. Koussevitzky has travelers

Dec, 6.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The first soloist of the regular series of Boston Symphony concerts will be Alexander Borovsky, who will appear with the orchestra at the pair of concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. He will be heard with the orchestra in Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto.

PENSION FUND

The music of Tchaikovsky will be conducted for the first time here by Serge Koussevitzy, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the annual winter pension fund concert to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, at 3:30. The program will include the fantasia "Francesco da Rimini," Serenade for strings, and the Fifth Symphony in E minor.

Boston Herald
Dec. 15

PAGE SEVEN

TCHAIKOVSKY MUSIC FOR PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky's Leading of Symphony Gets Ovation

The "Francesca da Rimini" fantasy, the elegy and the waltz from the serenade for strings, the E minor symphony, No. 5—this was the program Mr. Koussevitzky chose for the first Pension Fund Concert of the season, an "all Tchaikovsky program." If anyone felt disposed to ask why he did it, in Boston in 1924, a glance at the audience packing Symphony Hall to the doors would have answered the question. A finer program, nevertheless, would probably have served as well; surely Mr. Koussevitzky's fame is sufficiently great to fill the hall.

Granting the worthy determination to make sure of an overflowing audience, how could Mr. Koussevitzky bring himself to help lessen the diminishing fame of his great compatriot by performing his "Francesca"? In its day it made a stir by its frenzied representation of Dante's hell. But what ages so quickly in music as frenzy? The noise, at all events, is left. An uproar of equal parts of "Francesca," Stravinsky's "Spring" being not forgotten, has surely not been heard in Symphony Hall for many a day.

The audience, of a mind with the cook in Hardy's novel who would not heed Ethelberta's advice to wear less flamboyant bonnets "because she did like a good flare-up about her face of a Sunday afternoon," liked the fantasy very much. To judge by the applause, they liked the two movements from the Serenade far less. Empty music if it has enough flourish to it, evidently pleases better than honest, trivial music that is quiet.

It was good to hear, though late in the day, the symphony, Tchaikovsky perhaps at his best. Nothing he ever wrote sounds better, and even his most virulent detractors must admit that when pure sound is the matter in question Tchaikovsky, in his later years, knew what he was about. Its melody escapes the commonness that sometimes does Tchaikovsky's music damage. Its emotion is intense, but it does not fall into hysteria. If conductors jealous of Tchaikovsky's repute would content themselves with playing such music of his as is great of its kind, like the symphony in E minor, his memory would stay green the longer.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with studied care, without undue stress of its emotional force, yet effectively, at times thrillingly. The audience listened with an absorption very marked. The applause at the end was overwhelming.

R. R. G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIDDLETOWN
CONN.
PRESS
ISSUE OF
DEC 16 1924

Amusements

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at the Capitol theatre in Hartford, Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the direction of its new leader, Serge Koussevitsky, one of the world's truly great leaders. The orchestra gave its first concert in Carnegie hall, New York, on November 28th, of which Lawrence Gilman, of the Herald-Tribune, said:

"Certainly the chairs and standing room at Carnegie hall could not have been more completely filled than they were last night; and at every point where the polite inexorability of Mr. Koussevitsky would permit—at his entrances and culminations—the audience made manifest its enthusiastic approval of the new conductor, who, for three years, has set musical Europe by the ears. At the end of the concert, after Mr. Koussevitsky had borne them up into Scriabin's perfumed paradise on the frenetically mounting tides of that "Poeme de l'Extase," which he so dearly loves to set swirling about susceptible ears, they re-called him repeatedly to the stage.

Globe
Dec. 15

229

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky Vitalizes Tchaikovsky 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its two annual concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. A remarkably brilliant performance of an all-Tchaikovsky program was enthusiastically received. Paul Whiteman and George Gershwin, who were in the audience, gave every evidence of keen interest and admiration for both conductor and orchestra. Except for the standing room the hall was filled.

Koussevitzky has not put any music by Tchaikovsky on the programs of the subscription concerts up to date, except the B-flat minor piano concerto, which Borovsky played last week as a stop gap. Yesterday was thus the first real opportunity of hearing what he can make of the work of a composer now perhaps as much undervalued as he was overpraised 20 years since.

For there is a "Greater Tchaikovsky," whether or not there is a "Greater Chopin." The fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," after Dante, with which the program began, is so monotonously bombastic, so hopelessly dull that not all the nervous stress, the swelling climaxes, the sudden lulls which Koussevitzky's interpretation included could keep the listener's attention.

The elegy and waltz from the "Serenade for Strings" are agreeable if rather trivial and outmoded light music. If jazzed by Paul Whiteman's Orchestra they might still prove of interest. Koussevitzky's tendency to emphasize every effect he makes found here legitimate scope.

Th fifth symphony, the chief number on the program, made amends. Its second and fourth movements, in particular, have the emotional intensity, the quality that send shivers up and down the spine, which raises music above the reproach of mediocrity. Tchaikovsky is said to have thought in writing this music of the struggles of a man against fate. The music is at least melodramatic, if its crudeness of style denies it the prouder adjective "dramatic."

Koussevitzky's superbly sustained climaxes, his finely moulded melodies, his sense of proportion, made the music sound even better than it is. And it is the best example of "The Greater Tchaikovsky." This symphony, the opera "Eugen Oniegin," and perhaps the string quartet, will survive if any of Tchaikovsky survives a century hence.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
DEC 15 1924

MAY HEAR ARTISTS FOR ONLY 14 CENTS

Special Course Tickets to be Sold for Series of Concerts

Would you pay 14 cents to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra? That is not as foolish as it sounds, for that is just what Providence music-lovers can hear this famous orchestra for next year. The Boston Symphonoy is not the only musical organization to be heard in Providence at such ridiculous prices, for the Providence Music League, in announcing its fourth series of Sunday afternoon concerts at the E. F. Albee Theatre for January, February and March, has obtained real artists, and all three concerts may be heard by purchasing a special course ticket for 40 cents.

In fact, the expenses of the concerts are provided for, and all proceeds from sale of tickets, formerly turned over to Providence charities, this season will be saved as a nucleus of a fund to carry on the work of educating Rhode Island people to the appreciation of music.

Besides the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be the Kibalchich Russian choir, assisted by Samuel Gardner, violinist, on Jan. 4. This will be the opening concert. These Russian singers made their American debut last April in New York and scored a big hit.

The second concert will be Feb. 22, Washington's Birthday, with Dusolina Giannini, coloratura soprano, as the feature. She is but 22 years old, yet she is considered one of the finest singers on the American concert stage.

The final concert, in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the feature, will come on March 22. The program will be mixed, some popular and some classical and heavy orchestral selections.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Vogue DEC 15 1924
New York City

IT seems unbelievable to concert and opera goers of to-day that his Titanic majesty, the conductor, was once only "the gentleman who beats time." And this species of human metronome did not even face his band; he faced the audience! The modern public has come more and more to demand "personality" from the man who conducts an orchestra. He now faces his men as a matter of course, save when the exigencies of interpretation send him swaying this way and that, like a sunflower or a hollyhock caught in a hurricane, till his silhouette stands almost in profile against whatever background may be behind him. So far has he deviated from the mere time beating of a century ago that now he often visually "dramatizes" the music for his eager and expectant audience.

As one commentator—a conductor himself—has remarked, "By the skilful manipulation of his arms and hands, his hips and his hair, he gives the impression that when the cellos play a soulful melody, it really drips from his wrists, and when the kettle-drums play a dramatic roll, it is really the result of a flash of his eye." Inevitably, the question has been asked, "Out of all the swooning hosts that bow in rapt worship at the feet of the erudite Herr Pumpernickel, as with subtle wizardry he waves his wand over the symphonic aggregation from Nineveh on the Styx, how many could really distinguish their divinity from the gracious Signor Ravioli of the West Ravenna Philharmonic if a screen ample enough to shut off entirely his embattled gestures interposed between their eyes and their idol?"

CONCERNING THE CONDUCTOR

There actually are jokers who have the unfeeling audacity to propose that every orchestra, be it opera, symphonic, or Paul Whiteman's palpitating "jazz" should, Bayreuth fashion, play sunken out of the range of vision of its hearers—a sovereign method, one would say, of getting rid forever of the hearers! But audiences are not quite such an easy proposition as some jesters would have us think. They, after all, are the court of last appeal.

All of which is introductory to a prediction that the music season of 1924-25 in America will not echo through the ages with the name of a Caruso, a Mary Garden, a Maria Jeritza attached but will be known as the season of those crowned and annointed prime donne of the baton, the orchestral conductors.

In the first place, four of the season's officiating conductors are strange to us of America. Sergei Koussevitzky, out of Russia by way of Paris and London, has come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and immediately set things humming by conducting for the first time in this country, at his opening concert with that admired band, the "Pacific 231" of Arthur Honegger, which, a little later, Walter Damrosch introduced to New York at a concert of the New York Symphony. "Pacific 231," by the way, can not help being a featured novelty of the season. Here, the most prominent of the new generation of French composers (Honegger is in his early thirties) pays his respects to the giant modern railway locomotive as it booms at top speed through the night, tugging a thunderous train of Pullmans in its mighty wake.

Mr. Koussevitzky is undeniably a sensational conductor, but there is no reproach in that. He began his career as a virtuoso performer on the bass viol, instead of going in, like less venturesome men, for the smaller and more manageable cello. That was sensational at the getaway!

During the last few years, as a voluntary exile from Russia, in Paris, in London, and now in America, he has turned to conducting orchestras, with results that have kept curiosity and interest at a boiling-point wherever he has appeared. His programs, never trite or stodgy, have been steadily notable for the number of modern works, especially Russian or French, that he has been the first to bring out.

Another Russian who will conduct here shortly—and there is no question about his being a sensation—is Igor Stravinsky. We now know Stravinsky as the most widely discussed of living composers, the man who has given the world those remarkable ballets, "L'Oiseau de Feu," 'Pétrouchka," and "Le Sacre du Printemps," besides many other startling works. It is only lately that he has conducted at all or played the piano in public. But, here, he will conduct as "guest" the New York Philharmonic and, with that and other orchestras, will play his recently composed piano concerto, which, on the occasion of its initial performance last spring, set Paris literally by the ears.

The New York Philharmonic offers still another 'guest" conductor of a diametrically opposed type in Wilhelm Furtwaengler, one of the most distinguished of the younger orchestral leaders of Germany, who comes to us as the heritor of the great German conductors of the classic tradition. It naturally means much to Americans with a memory that Herr Furtwaengler happens to be the successor of the incomparable Arthur Nikisch as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipzig.

The New York Symphony has again as its "guests" Bruno Walter, of Munich, who has already made a solid place for himself with American audiences, and the young Russo-Frenchman, Vladimir Golschmann, who has a larger opportunity to display his youthful abilities this season than he had at a single concert last spring. Besides the various conducting "guests" and one brand-new "regular" leader in Mr. Koussevitzky, New York and other American cities can boast various symphonic leaders whose tenure is not transient. One has but to think of Walter Damrosch, Willem Mengelberg, and Josef Stransky in New York; of Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Frederick Stock in Chicago, Ossip Gabrilowitsch in Detroit, and Nikolai Sokoloff in Cleveland, and these men are only the most conspicuous of the guild through length of service or importance of achievement.

PENSION CONCERT SUPERB

Post Dec 15

Koussevitzky and His Band at Height of Powers

3

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Those who yesterday afternoon heard Mr. Koussevitzky lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its Pension Fund Concert heard conductor and orchestra at the height of their powers and in a programme that permitted the fullest and most brilliant exercise of Mr. Koussevitzky's characteristic abilities.

WISDOM IN CHOICE

From the music of Tchaikovsky came this programme, and it comprised the tone-poem "Francesca da Rimini," the Elegy and Waltz from the Serenade for Strings, and, lastly, the striding, opulent Fifth Symphony.

Since "Francesca da Rimini" had gone unheard at the Symphony Concerts for many a year, and since neither Serenade nor Symphony has been often played here of late, it seems safe to assume that yesterday's large audience had gathered to hear Mr. Koussevitzky quite as much as to hear this none too familiar music of Tchaikovsky. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky's wisdom in the choice of these pieces was made fully apparent before the afternoon was done.

Tone Poem Gripping

In the hands of a lesser conductor "Francesca da Rimini" may easily seem today no more than a half-successful effort to reproduce in tones one of the most affecting episodes in all literature. And not even Mr. Koussevitzky could redeem the blatancy of those measures wherein Tchaikovsky, striving to suggest the awesome fury of the winds of Hell, resorts to snorting brass, thumping drum and crashing cymbals a la Rossini. Yet for the rest these sections of the tone-poem seemed as they passed singularly graphic, gripping and suggestive; the episodes of Francesca's narrative had an irresistible poignancy; and truly harrowing, truly wracking were the final chords—the very choice of unutterable woe.

The two movements from the Serenade neither asked nor gave opportunity for a like miracle of re-creation. Rather there was here only a pervasive and persuasive loveliness of orchestral tone, the rarest beauty of phrasing, shading and accent.

A Master Guiding Hand

Finally, the performance of the Symphony was, on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky, a veritable tour de force. In the all but commonplace Andante, where a conductor less fine-grained would gild the lily of Tchaikovskian sentimentality, Mr. Koussevitzky ennobled the music, yet with no sacrifice of its perfervid emotionalism. In turn, in bewitching grace and lightness went the ensuing Waltz; while the first movement and the Finale alike because in Mr. Koussevitzky's hands extraordinarily dramatic.

Between the movements of the Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky, as is his custom, forbade intruding applause. Small wonder then that, freshly stimulated by the mounting climaxes of the close, it should at the end have burst forth with such warmth, such hearty fer- [illegible] Once again Mr. Koussevitzky has

Tuesday

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The first soloist of the regular series of Boston Symphony concerts will be Alexander Borovsky, who will appear with the orchestra at the pair of concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. He will be heard with the orchestra in Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto.

Pagani[illegible]arasate.

PENSION FUND

The music of Tchaikovsky will be conducted for the first time here by Serge Koussevitzy, new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the annual winter pension fund concert to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, at 3:30. The program will include the fantasia "Francesco da Rimini," Serenade for strings, and the Fifth Symphony in E minor.

Boston Herald
Dec. 15

PAGE SEVEN

TCHAIKOVSKY MUSIC FOR PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky's Leading of Symphony Gets Ovation

The "Francesca da Rimini" fantasy, the elegy and the waltz from the serenade for strings, the E minor symphony, No. 5—this was the program Mr. Koussevitzky chose for the first Pension Fund Concert of the season, an "all Tchaikovsky program." If anyone felt disposed to ask why he did it, in Boston in 1924, a glance at the audience packing Symphony Hall to the doors would have answered the question. A finer program, nevertheless, would probably have served as well; surely Mr. Koussevitzky's fame is sufficiently great to fill the hall.

Granting the worthy determination to make sure of an overflowing audience, how could Mr. Koussevitzky bring himself to help lessen the diminishing fame of his great compatriot by performing his "Francesca"? In its day it made a stir by its frenzied representation of Dante's hell. But what ages so quickly in music as frenzy? The noise, at all events, is left. An uproar to equal parts of "Francesca," Stravinsky's "Spring" being not forgotten, has surely not been heard in Symphony Hall for many a day.

The audience, of a mind with the cook in Hardy's novel who would not heed Ethelberta's advice to wear less flamboyant bonnets "because she did like a good flare-up about her face of a Sunday afternoon," liked the fantasy very much. To judge by the applause, they liked the two movements from the Serenade far less. Empty music if it has enough flourish to it, evidently pleases better than honest, trivial music that is quiet.

It was good to hear, though late in the day, the symphony, Tchaikovsky perhaps at his best. Nothing he ever wrote sounds better, and even his most virulent detractors must admit that when pure sound is the matter in question Tchaikovsky, in his later years, knew what he was about. Its melody escapes the commonness that sometimes does Tchaikovsky's music damage. Its emotion is intense, but it does not fall into hysteria. If conductors jealous of Tchaikovsky's repute would content themselves with playing such music of his as is great of its kind, like the symphony in E minor, his memory would stay green the longer.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the symphony with studied care, without undue stress of its emotional force, yet effectively, at times thrillingly. The audience listened with an absorption very marked. The applause at the end was overwhelming.

R. R. G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MIDDLETOWN
CONN.
PRESS
ISSUE OF
DEC 16 1924

Amusements

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert at the Capitol theatre in Hartford, Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the direction of its new leader, Serge Koussevitsky, one of the world's truly great leaders. The orchestra gave its first concert in Carnegie hall, New York, on November 28th, of which Lawrence Gilman, of the Herald-Tribune, said:

"Certainly the chairs and standing room at Carnegie hall could not have been more completely filled than they were last night; and at every point where the polite inexorability of Mr. Koussevitsky would permit—at his entrances and culminations—the audience made manifest its enthusiastic approval of the new conductor, who, for three years, has set musical Europe by the ears. At the end of the concert, after Mr. Koussevitsky had borne them up into Scriabin's perfumed paradise on the frenetically mounting tides of that "Poeme de l'Extase," which he so dear'y loves to set swirling about susceptible ears, they re-called him repeatedly to the stage.

"To[illegible]

Globe
Dec. 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Koussevitzky Vitalizes Tchaikovsky

4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its two annual concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. A remarkably brilliant performance of an all-Tchaikovsky program was enthusiastically received. Paul Whiteman and George Gershwin, who were in the audience, gave every evidence of keen interest and admiration for both conductor and orchestra. Except for the standing room the hall was filled.

Koussevitzky has not put any music by Tchaikovsky on the programs of the subscription concerts up to date, except the B-flat minor piano concerto, which Borovsky played last week as a stop gap. Yesterday was thus the first real opportunity of hearing what he can make of the work of a composer now perhaps as much undervalued as he was overpraised 20 years since.

For there is a "Greater Tchaikovsky," whether or not there is a "Greater Chopin." The fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," after Dante, with which the program began, is so monotonously bombastic, so hopelessly dull that not all the nervous stress, the swelling climaxes, the sudden lulls which Koussevitzky's interpretation included could keep the listener's attention.

The elegy and waltz from the "Serenade for Strings" are agreeable if rather trivial and outmoded light music. If jazzed by Paul Whiteman's Orchestra they might still prove of interest. Koussevitzky's tendency to emphasize every effect he makes found here legitimate scope.

Th fifth symphony, the chief number on the program, made amends. Its second and fourth movements, in particular, have the emotional intensity, the quality that send shivers up and down the spine, which raises music above the reproach of mediocrity. Tchaikovsky is said to have thought in writing this music of the struggles of a man against fate. The music is at least melodramatic, if its crudeness of style denies it the prouder adjective "dramatic."

Koussevitzky's superbly sustained climaxes, his finely moulded melodies, his sense of proportion, made the music sound even better than it is. And it is the best example of "The Greater Tchaikovsky." This symphony, the opera "Eugen Oniegin," and perhaps the string quartet, will survive if any of Tchaikovsky survives a century hence.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

DEC 15 1924

MAY HEAR ARTISTS FOR ONLY 14 CENTS

Special Course Tickets to be Sold for Series of Concerts

Would you pay 14 cents to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra? That is not as foolish as it sounds, for that is just what Providence music-lovers can hear this famous orchestra for next year. The Boston Symphonoy is not the only musical organization to be heard in Providence at such ridiculous prices, for the Providence Music League, in announcing its fourth series of Sunday afternoon concerts at the E. F. Albee Theatre for January, February and March, has obtained real artists, and all three concerts may be heard by purchasing a special course ticket for 40 cents.

In fact, the expenses of the concerts are provided for, and all proceeds from sale of tickets, formerly turned over to Providence charities, this season will be saved as a nucleus of a fund to carry on the work of educating Rhode Island people to the appreciation of music.

Besides the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be the Kibalchich Russian choir, assisted by Samuel Gardner, violinist, on Jan. 4. This will be the opening concert. These Russian singers made their American debut last April in New York and scored a big hit.

The second concert will be Feb. 22, Washington's Birthday, with Dusolina Giannini, coloratura soprano, as the feature. She is but 22 years old, yet she is considered one of the finest singers on the American concert stage.

The final concert, in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the feature, will come on March 22. The program will be mixed, some popular and some classical and heavy orchestral selections.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

230

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM DEC 17 1924
New York City

It might interest both those who hissed and those who applauded (the latter were vastly more numerous) Edgar Varese's "Hyperprism" in Carnegie Hall last evening to know that part of an audience walked out in high dudgeon on the very Cesar Franck symphony which had preceded the Varese invention when that neo-classic was performed for the first time in Boston some twenty-five years ago. Franck seemed to those good fin de siecle Bostonians as desperately subversive as Varese seemed to anybody in Carnegie Hall last night, and probably not a hundredth part so amusing.

Leopold Stokowski, in this program of the visiting Philadelphia Orchestra, placed "Hyperprism" serially above such primary musical prisms as the aforesaid symphony and the three orchestral excerpts of custom from "The Damnation of Faust," and, after the commotion occasioned by that culminating group of battling planes and multiple refractions had ceased, tapered things off to normalcy with Debussy's ever handy "Clouds" and "Festivals." So none in the huge audience that went out into the night could complain that he had "heard no music," whether he was of the clapping many or of the sibilant few. And, anyhow, the concert was not dull.

"Hyperprism" was played first at a concert of the International Composers' Guild at the Klaw Theatre, March 4, 1923. Scored for sixteen instruments of percussion—everything in sight except the coal scuttle—plus two samples of woodwind and seven of brass, this opus snarls and barks and growls, roars sadly like a lion caged, moos like the gentle, ruminating cow. Many will maintain that it is not music—an old complaint. Others will simply say they do not know, and trust nature to take its course. Mr. Varese himself has gone on record to this extent:—"'Hyperprism' is not program-music. . . . I should prefer to say only that the title has a geometrical connotation and implies a fourth-dimensional significance." Probably it's as well to let the matter go at that.

The audience received the work with a running obbligato of laughter, with a great deal of applause, and with a little hissing. It was evident that some of those present were eager to have it repeated. In view of all the circumstances—but all—Mr. Stokowski could in this instance have afforded to grant the "encore."

The familiar music tossed into the night's arena was played according to the virtuosity, which, though now a matter of course with the Philadelphians, always excites fresh wonder whenever they are heard in New York. Mr. Stokowski conducted with admirable efficiency, even though his acutely individual treatment of this page or that were highly spiced with challenge. Thus the clash of elements in the symphony at times seemed like the shock of actual battle. Neither the will-o'-the-wisps nor the sylphs of Berlioz were trifles quite so light as air, and the electrifying climax of the "Rakoczy March" would have been even more hair raising had the first annunciation of the theme by flutes and clarinets really been played piano instead of in a hearty mezzo-forte.

Still, there was no blundering in all this. Whatever Mr. Stokowski did he did because he wanted to. His orchestra is an absolutely responsive instrument. Unforgettable was the timbre of the pizzicato strings at the beginning of the allegretto of Franck's symphony and Debussy's "Festivals" was played in every respect superbly. Mr. Stokowski is to be thanked for his justness of tempo in the cortege that crosses these festivals. When Mr. Koussevitsky conducted the work here recently the cortege might have been a noisy funeral. There was nothing funereal about its progress yesterday. And the festivals ended as if spirited away on the breath of a sephyr.

Mingled emotions of a concert with Stokowski and Varese.

PITTS SANBORN.

Transcript
Dec. 17

Incidents and Prospects

Ever since Mr. Koussevitsky came to Boston, he has had in mind Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rite of Spring," for repetition at the Symphony Concerts. Now he has found the occasion, and on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, the music will be played as tone-poem for the fifth and the sixth times in Boston within eleven months. As the old editorial phrase used to go, "we yield to no one" in admiration for the piece. Yet, as the ancient proverb also says, "enough is as good as a feast." No doubt, however, like the reverend clergy with their texts, Mr. Koussevitsky will throw new light upon his subject. Three pieces will precede "Le Sacre" on the program—a Suite from "Christmas Eve," opera by Rimsky-Korsakow, little known and rarely heard in these parts; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Mr. Koussevitsky's most debated [illegible] resurrected eighteenth-[illegible] symphony of Haydn, noted yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
DEC 17 1924

Orchestra Plays Odd Music

Philadelphia Men at Fifth Concert Present 'Hyperprisms' of Edgard Varese.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Philadelphia Orchestra gave its fifth concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. Some admirable musicmakers were represented on the program, which began with the exceedingly frequent symphony of Cesar Franck. This is one of the very choicest compositions in the repertory of any orchestra or any conductor. It gives an orchestra scope for the display of its richest and most transparent tone, while it provides the conductor with a fine field for interpretative explorations.

Hector Berlioz contributed the familiar three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and Debussy the two nocturnes about clouds and fetes. It may possibly be recalled that the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented these same nocturnes at his first New York concert and evoked enthusiasm. But naturally that is not why they were played last evening.

There was one other number, the "Hyperprisms" of Edgard Varese for small orchestra and percussion. It was revealed here on March 4, 1923, at a concert of the International Composers' Guild and was introduced to Philadelphia by Mr. Stokowski on November 6. When it was sent whirling into the auditorium of the Klaw Theater, some people laughed and others hissed. Carlos Salzedo leaped to his feet and shouted, "This thing is serious!" And our own inimitable Carl Ruggles cried, "People who don't like this sort of thing ought to stay away." Which was the most veritistic remark, musical or otherwise, of the entire evening. Last evening's audience laughed and applauded. Goats are not raised in this town, as they once were, and not even Mr. Varese can forcibly annex any from a New York audience.

No words can describe this extraordinary production, not even the strange word "Hypeprisms." But Bully Bottom in his proudest moments could not have given such imitations of the roaring of the lion, the shrieking of the wind, the pattering of hailstones and the swearing of the keepers of the distracted menagerie. No cat smaller than a Bengal tiger would have ventured into such company. If Mr. Varese honestly believes this sort of thing is music then he is a deluded and impotent follower of that eminent Vienneses juggler who makes his trickery almost plausible. The lover of art can only declare his faith that the time will come when all these decompositions will be swept violently down a steep place into the sea.

Mr. Stokowski performed a remarkable and quite worthless feat in committing the score to memory. He was far better occupied when he learned the other works on the list. His reading of the Franck symphony was indeed a reading. It might easily have aroused the ire of purists by its mercilessly exposed analyst. Its prodigious emphasis of points, its exaggerated alterations of tempi and its passionate devotion to bass passages. But it was so complete in itself, so finished and exquisitely wrought along its own lines, and it sounded so opulent and so luminous, that no one need have disputed it. It was Mr. Stokowski's own version of the symphony and he left not a detail of his interpretation in doubt.

The three battered and shopworn Berlioz fragments were transformed into veritable virtuoso pieces. They displayed the splendid technic of the orchestra most brilliantly. If Mr. Howarth had been in a box last evening he would have raved more than he did when he first heard the Rakoczy march. The audience was vigorous in its demonstrations of approval.

NEW YORK CITY
WOMEN'S WEAR
DEC 18 1924

Nadia Boulanger, French organist, pianist and lecturer, who will arrive at the end of the month for her first American tour, will be heard in Philadelphia on Jan. 9. Her New York debut is scheduled for Jan. 11 with the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch. Later she will play with the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 17 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

[illegible]rchestra to [illegible] Here as Super-Sidgwick Attraction.

Musically the new year holds forth nothing more attractive than the coming Boston Symphony concert, which will be heard in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon, February 1, under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The orchestra returns to Hartford after an absence of two years and added zest is given teh event by the first appearance here of Serge Koussevitsky, the new leader and one of the worlds' greatest musicians. He is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. Previous to his coming to America last September he was called the only great conductor whom this country had not heard. He is described as a leader of rare charm magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions. He coming to Hartford in February is one of the outstanding musical events of the season and will no doubt obcasion the largest audience that has ever attended a Boston Symphony concert in this city. The orchestra retains intact the remarkable personnel of former seasons. The organization numbers 104 super musicians. The demand for seats for this notable concert exceeds that of any other season by far and the longsighted concert goer will do well to make immediate application for seats. The sale is now in progress at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted. All checks and orders should be made out and directed to Frank A. Sedgwick, manager.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 18 1924

A distinguished foreign educator was lecturing recently at the Professional Women's Club. Waiting to take the platform were Governor Cox, Conductor Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, and Judge Frederick Cabot.

The iron-clad rule of the meeting was that each speaker should take five minutes only. At the end of the overseas visitor's first quarter hour, Chairman Eva Macy Watson began to fidget. At the end of 20 minutes, she coughed warningly. At the end of 25 minutes, a tactful gentleman plucked at the speaker's sleeve. The latter smiled his thanks, extended his water glass, and allowed the gentleman to pour him a drink.

Then Chairman Watson took action. She scribbled a stern little note, slipped it ostentatiously on the speaker's desk, and resumed her seat. The speaker glanced at it, looked again, and hesitated.

"This," he said, "concludes what I have to say on this subject. I will now go on to the second half of my lecture which has to do with the history of the Holy Wars of India."

At the end of an hour, the Holy Wars had been given their inning. The speaker bowed to such applause as there was. Then he hurried to Chairman Watson's desk.

"One thousand pardons, madame," he said. "But I could not wholly read your so kind note of appreciation. English as she is printed, I am able to decipher but, as she is written by a woman's hand, I am not always sure."

CONCERTO CHINOISE, SYNCOPATED SCHERZO, MANUSCRIPT MUSIC

NOVEL PIECES AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two Pianos Give Unusual Opportunity—Mr. Bliss Discards Strings and Sets a Geometrical Tonal Pattern—Mr. Hill Coquets Artfully and Amusingly with Jazz—A Word About Both

At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, two pianos, with Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison to play them, will enlarge and diversify the voices of the orchestra. Accordingly, Mr. Koussevitzky has seized the opportunity—or rather made it—to produce two pieces from the composers' manuscripts: Mr. Bliss's Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra without Strings; Mr. Hill's Scherzo for Two Pianos and normal Orchestra. Mr. Bliss's music summarily achieves that brevity which is the soul of precision as well as of wit. It runs in one movement and it lasts barely eleven minutes. Before it, moreover, the composer sets the following note:

> No explanation is really needed for the comprehension of this Concerto, as it is intended as music in the abstract without any extra-musical association. There is no literary program attached to it, nor does it seek to convey any particular atmosphere or paint any mental image. It is to be regarded as sound and nothing else, and the total impression it aims at cannot be explained by the help of any sister-art.
>
> I have eschewed the string tone in this work, from the rooted conviction that strings and pianos are unpleasant to the ear. I have never liked violin or violoncello-sonatas, or pianotrios, from the point of view of a listener, however beautiful the material written for those instruments. So I determined to concentrate on a pianistic combination that was blended with wood-wind, brass and percussion, but no stringed instrument.
>
> The Concerto is in one movement and follows a very geometric design. As an oriental print is often developed from one small and seemingly inconspicuous pattern, so the form of this work is knit closely together by the development of a two-bar theme that makes its appearance in the second bar. The pianos are not used as in the classical concerto, where they fill the rôle of star performer to a background of chorus, but are of an equal integral part of the whole composition, and can be regarded as two great arabesque-making machines. Both piano designs are conceived for virtuosi-pianists or pianola-players.

In spite of Mr. Bliss's belief that the Concerto is knit together by a two-bar theme which makes its appearance in the second measure—a belief well founded as regards the unity of the piece and the means of its achievements—the Concerto is built out of two melodic ideas. The first a quick figure sugestive of Chinese bells; the second a slower and more gracefully melodic theme. The whole music is a concise statement and development of these two suggestions, as thin, firm, and precise as a Chinese drawing. Indeed, the Chinese accent in this music is its most prominent characteristic. Mr. Bliss has evidently been profoundly influenced by the studies in Chinese music of Henry Eichheim, who also dwells in Santa Barbara. His use of instruments of percussion, his constant references to bells and gongs, his high, brittle sonorities are the superficial expressions of a more profound orientalism which gives the Concerto impersonal, almost objective, epigrammatic, quality.

The pianos are used, according to the best modern practise, as instruments of percussion. Melodically, of course, the piano is a very inferior instrument. Its singing is brief, faint, and void of character when compared with that of wind or strings. Its true idiom is brilliant filigree, sharp and pointed outline of lace or spray. For that it is incomparable and for that Mr. Bliss has written his score.

Humors of Hill

Mr. Hill's Scherzo may be associated with a series of American compositions, that owe their inspiration to our contemporary folk-music or jazz. John Powell's "Negro Rhapsody" and sundry pieces by Henry Gilbert record, however, a devotion not so much to that idiom itself as to its sources. Mr. Hill's real brothers in faith are George Gershwin of the "Rhapsody in Blue," and John Alden Carpenter of the Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. Mr. Hill, however, is no novice at this sort of thing. His Jazz Study for Two Pianos has been played far and wide by Messrs. Maier and Pattison and by others; while his unpublished pieces include a highly diverting Quasi-Fox-Trot for clarinet and a string quartet which has a scherzo in jazz style.

The present piece attempts no compromise with syncopation. It surrenders in the first bar. The compromise, if there is one, is with the classics, because the music happens to be written in sonata form. Compromise, however, is an unjust epithet. The form of the piece is no academic model to which alien material has been distorted. It is employed simply as the best way to make a musical structure out of two ideas capable of development. There is an introduction in fox-trot rhythm which unfolds in the key of G minor a phrase of obvious negro quality. (There is strong suggestion here of an old song of many stanzas, commonly known as "Hesitation Blues.") The first theme proper, which is closely related to the phrase, undergoes a slight development and leads through a climactic bridge-passage to a sentimental second theme in three-four time, key of F major. Development, recapitalation, and a short coda follow. But sonata-form, as such, is of no importance to the piece. The logic of the music merely happens to lead it through that path.

Mr. Hill's harmonic style, though complex, is not dissimilar to that we are accustomed to in the better dance halls—solid and simple key-relations as the basic sculpture for a highly chromatic coloration. The instrumentation is in the last degree delicate and apt. It requires no saxophones or whistles, no raucous battery and, for all its sensuous suggestion, is in no way indecorous. In fact, the piece is not, in the emotional sense, jazz at all, any more than Bach's fugue on "Ein Feste Burg" is the song of Luther's marching soldiers. Both pieces are, in the best meaning of the word, academic. And if a discourse in the university in the Germany of Bach's time wished to be serious and profound so did a fugue by the great contrapuntist on such a serious subject. Mr. Hill has likewise maintained a scholarly propriety. He has written music about jazz. Now the musical reflexions of such a penetrating and musical mind cannot fail to be amusing. Perhaps the style of university discourse has changed since the time when a connotation of dullness was attached to the word. At any rate, Mr. Hill's music is gay and spirited, fragile, witty, subtle, indelicate, distinguished and elegant. And it is elegant neither with a dowdy Boston grandeur nor with the gaudy ornaments of a New York dowager. His score is devoid of the unessential as a costume by Paquin.

Just as Carpenter's Concertino expresses the exuberance of Chicago and Gershwin's Rhapsody something of the self-conscious melodrama of Broadway, so does Mr. Hill's Scherzo attain to that intellectual chic which sometimes characterizes Bostonians who have lived long in Paris. His approach to jazz is really far more sophisticated than that of either of the other composers. Mr. Carpenter speaks the popular idiom like one who relearns his mother tongue after a sojourn in foreign parts, mouthing with gusto its racial idiosyncrasies. Mr. Gershwin, only too familiar with the limitations of jazz, would expand it with classic lore and write an epic. Mr. Hill learns it as if it were vulgar Latin and composes epigrams about it. Mr. Carpenter, with Western hospitality, would accept jazz as he might an old schoolmate, to dance with at the country club. Mr. Gershwin, better aware of her true character, would refine and educate her, and as Heywood Broun says, "make her an honest woman." Mr. Hill has no such ethical motive. She amuses him. And if as New Englander and as academicion he would consider it unseemly to indulge in any extreme familiarity with a muse whose race and upbringing are so different from his own, his detachment makes him all the more competent to appreciate her qualities and to carry off our hearing a dazzling, and, perhaps, a sincere flirtation.

Herald
Dec. 14

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is an unusual one. The purely orchestral pieces will be a symphony that Hadyn wrote in Paris and Ravel's "The Waltz." Messrs. Maier and Pattison will play a concerto by Emanuel Bach composed originally for piano, harpsicord and orchestra. Arthur Bliss, London born, but of an American father, has written a concerto for these pianists, which will be performed for the first time. Mr. Bliss, who has been living for some time in California, writes that he has discarded string instruments in this work. He did this from the "rooted conviction" that strings and piano are unpleasant to the ear. "I have never liked violin or 'cello sonatas, or piano trios, from the point of view of a listener, however beautiful the material written for those instruments, so I determined to concentrate on a pianistic combination that was blended with wood-wind, brass and percussion. . . . The pianos are not used as in the classical concerts, where they fill the role of star performer to a background of chorus, but are of an equal integral part of the whole composition and can be regarded as two great arabesque-making machines. Both piano designs are conceived for virtuosi pianists or pianola players." Mr. Bliss's "Color" symphony was performed here by the Symphony orchestra a year ago this month. It excited lively discussion, although no disputants came to blows in the corridors of Symphony hall and no duels were fought on Boston Common.

Mr. Hill's "Scherzo" for two pianos and orchestra will also be played for the first time. It was written originally for one piano and orchestra. Mr. Maier suggested that it should be remodelled for him and Mr. Pattison. This was done last summer. Mr. Hill writes:

"While I am not of those ardent enthusiasts who affirm that the future of American music lies in a wholesale assimilation of the 'jazz' style, I nevertheless sincerely admire its best traits. It furthermore seems a fitting, if somewhat limited, field of experiment for the American composer of serious aims. This problem has already tempted Messrs. Powell, Carpenter and Gershwin."

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
GLOBE
DEC 18 1924

231

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Lovers of the musical art are keenly and anxiously awaiting the Boston Symphony orchestra which is to appear at the Empire Theatre, Sunday afternoon, December 28th. Seats are now on sale at the box office and there are still many choice seats to be had.

In Serge Koussevitsky, the great Russian leader, the orchestra has acquired the services of a truly great musical conductor. While he wrought brilliant results in Western Europe, Mr. Koussevitsky was always overcoming resistant conditions. Since leaving Russia he has not had an orchestra of his own with the long and constant association in rehearsal which alone can bring a complete understanding between conductor and orchestra. Now, conditions ideal for pre-eminent leadership lie before him in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which retains the remarkable personnel of last season.

And along with this wonderful combination of soloists comes Ethel Leginska, the Paderewski of pianists. Unlike most pianists whose biography informs us that they were "born musicians," coming from a long line of musical ancestry, Leginska lays no claim to any such distinction in her family. From babyhood she just played and even today, in spite of her rank in musicdom she is still a thoughtful, patient student, entirely devoted to her playing and composing.

She is "one of the most remarkable women pianists now before the public." Such were the words of the late H. E. Krehbiel, dean of American music critics, in the New York Tribune.

JAZZ MUSIC BY CAMBRIDGE COMPOSER A SYMPHONY HIT

POLITE jazz music—jazz in tuxedo, as you might say—is introduced into this week's Symphony program by Edward Burlinghame Hill, the Cambridge composer, in a scherzo for two pianos and orchestra.

The scherzo, one of three novelties featured at this ninth Symphony matinee, pleased the audience hugely. So did the performance. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to take especially delight in conducting this ingenious, admirably written composition, with its ingratiating themes, piquant rhythms, and effective orchestration. The scherzo is the work of a gifted and imaginative American modernist and it was so accepted by conductor and audience.

Guy Maier

Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison, who have long been prominently identified with Boston musical activities, also took part in the performances of a concerto by C. P. E. Bach, written probably 150 years ago, but only recently discovered. This was the second American performance of the charming piece, the first in Chicago. The two pianists were also heard in Arthur Bliss' new concerto for the pianos and wind instruments, played yesterday for the first time anywhere.

Lee Pattison

Brilliant performances of Haydn's G major Symphony and Ravel's dance poem, "La Valse," were also memorable features of the concert.

AMUSEMENTS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
DEC 20 1924

PIANISTS JAZZ WITH SYMPHONY

Maier and Pattison Play Hill's Scherzo for Two Pianos

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Hunt the composer was the game played at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon—but scant success attended the efforts of most of the participants.

As next to last number on the programme came, in its initial performance, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Jazz" Scherzo for two pianos, with Guy Maier and Lee Pattison as the soloists, and the audience liked the piece mightily. In answer, then, to the continuing applause Mr. Koussevitzky and the pianists returned again and again to the stage—but, though there was much craning of necks, the composer was nowhere to be found.

IN REAR BALCONY

Finally Mr. Koussevitzky, with a broad smile and a twinkle in his eye, shrugged his shoulders and shrugged them again, as though to say: I know it is not us you want to see, but what can we do about it?" And then, just as a few began to realize that Mr. Hill was in fact modestly bowing from his seat in the rear of the first balcony, Mr. Maier raised a silencing hand to announce: "We are looking for Mr. Hill. Is he here?"

There were answers of Yes," but meanwhile that composer had once more sunk into the obscurity of his balcony seat, and the ovation that all were eager to accord him was thus successfully shunned.

Not in Best Vein

Beyond question this Scherzo is a highly ingenious and a most diverting piece. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that it did not quite fulfill the expectations aroused by its composer's less pretentious Jazz Study for two pianos that Messrs. Maier and Pattison have so frequently played here.

Faced with a full orchestra and two pianos besides, Mr. Hill seems to have been over-conscious of the traditional dignity of his medium and hence fearful of writing the sentimental melodies and the obvious rhythms without which jazz as not jazz at all. One eye, or rather one ear, Mr. Hill turned toward Broadway, but the other, it would seem, was on the Champs Elysees. Almost it was as though Milhaud or Stravinsky were striving—as, indeed, each has— to assimilate the, to him, exotic idiom.

Misses the Stvor

Beside Mr. Hill, artful, expert, sophisticated, Mr. Gershwin of the Rhapsody in Blue," who did not even make the orchestral score of his own music, is but a little boy playing with his blocks. Yet for all its haltings and its uncertainties, the Rhapsody has the raciness and the savor, yes, the genuineness of feeling, that Mr. Hill's Scherzo comes so close to missing altogether.

Very nearly did it come to being Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison's concert yesterday. A delightful performance of one of Haydn's finest Symphonies, that in G major of the Beethoven-like Largo, was followed by a two-piano Concerto of Carl Philip Emmanuel Bach. Fading and faded much of this latter music assuredly is, yet it has its many pages of charm, and it was superbly played yesterday by soloists and orchestra.

Bliss' Concerto Weak

Then, the intermission over, the pianists reappeared to be heard, before the Jazz Scherzo, in the first performance of a Concerto for two pianos, wind-instruments and percussion, by Arthur Bliss, the independently-minded young Englishman who now resides in California.

Mr. Bliss was already favorably known to Boston through his provacative "Color Symphony" and by some striking songs, while much of his other music has been warmly praised abroad. The Concerto yesterday, however, seemed on one hearing a piece laboriously contrived and singularly barren of original ideas, if not of novel procedures. The reproach to be levelled against Mr. Bliss' latest music is not that it disdains accepted canons of beauty, but rather that, despite certain energetically rhythmed passages and an English horn solo that recalls the Shepherd of "Tristan," it is empty and dull.

Ravel Idealizes the Waltz

To this mingling of the 18th and the 20th centuries was added yesterday Ravel's brilliant diversion, "La Valse," music that, though still of the 20th century, would recall a scene from the middle years of the 19th. Heard immediately after Mr. Hill's Scherzo, "La Valse" inevitably prompted the reflection that no composer has yet glorified jazz as Ravel has here idealized and transfigured the Viennese waltz. And incidentally this jeu d'esprit received yesterday a performance gorgeously brilliant and superbly rhythmical.

And yet it was possible to feel that "La Valse" was not too happily placed on yesterday's programme. After so much artifice a taste of music more deeply felt would have been doubly welcome. At least one hearer betook himself from Symphony Hall remembering gratefully that unforced gayety of Haydn's Finale, the breadth and calm of his Largo.

No, good friends, music is neither as young nor as fresh as once it was.

Retail stores desiring salespeople with experience and character will secure a good selection by inserting Help Wanted ads in the classified columns of the Boston Post.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

EVER since Mr. Koussevitzky came to Boston, he has had in mind Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rite of Spring," for repetition at the Symphony Concerts. Now he has found the occasion, and on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, the music will be played as tone-poem for the fifth and the sixth times in Boston within eleven months. As the old editorial phrase used to go, "we yield to no one" in admiration for the piece. Yet, as the ancient proverb also says, "enough is as good as a feast." No doubt, however, like the reverend clergy with their texts, Mr. Koussevitzky will throw new light upon his subject. Three pieces will precede "Le Sacre" on the program—a Suite from "Christmas Eve," opera by Rimsky-Korsakov, little known and rarely heard in these parts; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most debated "readings"; the resurrected eighteenth-century Symphony of Rigel, noted recently in this place.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
DEC 20 1924

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Vladimir Golschmann Conducts the Symphony Orchestra as Guest

Concert by the Symphony Society of New York, Vladimir Golschmann, Guest Conductor; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ..... Mozart
2. Symphony No. 4, in D minor..Schumann
3. A Night on Bald Mountain..Moussorgsky
4. The Flight of the Bumble Bee, from "Tsar Saltan"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
5. La Valse..... Ravel

We agree with that musicianly music critic, Max Smith, that there is nothing in the theory that a conductor must be a German in order to achieve a fine performance of "Tristan und Isolde," or a Frenchman in order to conduct Debussy with insight and felicity. We have heard "Tristan" under every conductor who has ever led it in New York—most of them north or central Europeans; and it was an Italian who gave us the most eloquent performance we have ever heard of that not completely Italianate score. The worst performance we ever heard of Debussy's "La Mer" was by a Frenchman, the best was by a German from Darmstadt.

These things being so (at least, according to our notion), we doubt if it was because young Mr. Vladimir Golschmann is a Parisianized Russian that he conducted so badly last night the D minor Symphony of that quintessentially German composer, Robert Schumann. It would probably be nearer the truth to assume that it was because the gods did not endow Mr. Golschmann with the special qualities which are necessary to a sympathetic comprehension of that gentlest and most poetic of the Romantic composers.

* * *

It was significant that Mr. Golschmann dealt most happily with the D minor Symphony in those pages wherein it is least typically Schumannesque—in, for example, that marvellously dramatic passage wherewith Schumann makes his transit from the Scherzo to the Finale of his Symphony, with its declamatory phrases in the brass, its mysteriously murmuring tremolos, its soaring violins. But here Schumann is less himself than he is Beethoven. It was Mr. Henderson in his "Preludes and Studies," published two years before Mr. Golschmann was born, who pointed out the fact that this astonishing passage is akin to that between the corresponding movements in Beethoven's Fifth; and to our mind it is scarcely inferior in imaginative power and suggestiveness to that famous episode.

Mr. Golschmann was admirable in his reading of this page—we have seldom heard it done more dramatically. And he was admirable wherever else in the symphony Schumann was less his poetically rhapsodic or tenderly musing self, and more nearly akin to the brass-bound, two-fisted hundred per center into whom Mr. Golschmann seemed eager to transform him.

* * *

Indeed, Mr. Golschmann seemed obsessed throughout the performance with the conviction that he was dealing with a work written for horns, trumpets, trombones and drums, with strings and woodwind obbligati. One could shut one's eyes and almost fancy that one were listening to a concert by Mr. Goldman's excellent band on a June evening in Central Park.

* * *

This method of treating Schumann's score inevitably resulted in a good deal of raucous and unbalanced playing by the orchestra; and it brought in its train, not unnaturally, some playing that was careless of fine and significant detail.

We listened expectantly, for example, to that delicious passage in the Trio of the Scherzo (one of the loveliest in all Schumann) where the first fiddles recall the solo violin passage of the Romanza—for we are fond of that passage. But we were cheated; for Mr. Golschmann's violins slighted in each measure the uppermost note of the phrase (successively, the F, D, etc.), and we heard only the first, second, third, fourth and sixth notes of the melody in each bar. But Mr. Golschmann did not seem to mind, for he allowed his players to do the same thing at every return of the melody. Details like this seemed not to interest him, yet they are of the essence of Schumann's style in this music.

But it is only fair to him to say that his performance of the symphony was evidently most acceptable to the audience, for they rewarded him at its conclusion with the heartiest kind of applause.

* * *

The best thing Mr. Golschmann did last night was his performance of the charming coda of Moussorgsky's tone-poem, "A Night on Bald Mountain": that poetic passage (the only writing in the score that is at all worthy of Moussorgsky's genius) in which at the height of the dreadful orgies of the Slavonic Walpurgisnacht, when Chernobog the Black God is having everything his own way, the bell of the little village church is heard from afar, and the Spirits of Darkness are dispelled, and day breaks tranquilly on the orchestral horizon. Here Mr. Golschmann was a poet of sensitive imagination, and a delicate shaper of instrumental hues and patterns. It was a delightful effect that he secured here, quite perfect for its subtle and poetic beauty.

* * *

We are obliged to report that he saw fit to emulate Mr. Koussevitzky by repeating Rimsky's "Bumble Bee" scherzo. It is to be hoped, by the way, that Mr. Koussevitzky is properly gratified by the compliment which his conductorial colleagues in these parts are paying him as a program-maker. Their motto seems to be: Watch Sergei, and beat him to it. Or, if you can't, do it after him.

KOUSSEVITZKY PROGRAMMES ANNOUNCED

Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall New Year's Night—Next Week's Concerts.

Speculation as to just how much and what kind of new music Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is likely to include on the programmes for his New York concerts is something that actively engages not only the subscribers but a good part of the rest of a musical community. Mr. Koussevitzky made his reputation abroad chiefly as an interpreter of the young ultraists of the day, and whilst his first pair of programmes at Carnegie Hall last month revealed his predilections a little, the next pair, on New Year's night and the following Saturday afternoon, ought to be of even greater interest.

These coming programmes are now at hand. That for Thursday evening features Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," introduced to New York by Mr. Monteux, the Russian's predecessor. Mr. Stravinsky himself will be here by that time and will be playing the same piece when he conducts the Philharmonic Orchestra—all of which will doubtless add to the general excitement over the matter.

The rest of this Thursday evening's programme will consist of Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and a symphony by Henri Jean Rigel, a name as unknown here to most people as that of the newest youngster among the most modern of the modernists. Rigel was the Paris-born son of a German father, the latter spelling his name Riegel. The son was chiefly known at the beginning of the last century for a few operas, one of which he produced at Cairo when he was conductor of the French opera there between 1798 and 1880. The symphony in C major that Mr. Koussevitzky will play is the only one Rigel wrote and, so far as one knows, it has never been played here—or at least, not in the last twenty years.

The Saturday afternoon programme will have Sergei Rachmaninoff as soloist in his own second piano concerto. Otherwise there will be some of the orchestral music from Manuel de Falla's opera, "El Amor Brujo," excerpts from which Kurt Schindler did here a few years ago; Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Maurice Ravel's "La Valse."

FITCHBURG
MASS.
SENTINEL
ISSUE OF
DEC 20 1924

Boston is flocking to the Boston Symphony concerts in record-breaking numbers as well as New York. Reserved seats in both places are at a premium for the concerts this year. Conductor Koussevitzky, who replaced Pierre Monteux as conductor this year, seems to be the magnet that is responsible for the wonderful drawing power of the orchestra.

SYMPHONY GIVES NINTH CONCERT

Unusual Program Excites Large Audience to Warm Applause

TWO 2-PIANO PIECES PLAYED FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, G major B. & H. No. 13); C. P. E. Bach, Concerto, E flat major, for two pianos (first time in Boston); Bliss, Concerto for two pianos (first performance); Hill, Scherzo for two pianos (first performance); Ravel, The Waltz. Guy Maier and Lee Pattison were the pianists.

Haydn's symphony is one of a set written for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris. The orchestration of this society was famous for its precision of attack. Haydn wrote, no doubt, with a view to French taste, having in mind grace, suavity, and liveliness. The performance yetserday was a constant pleasure to the ear. The composer's gaiety was not merely careless rollicking. There were subtle and effective nuances in the interpretation of the opening quick movement and the Finale. The second movement was taken at so deliberate a pace that one feared at first consequent tedium, but the richly sonorous song was made vital; there was sustained interest, and the tempo chosen gave the needed contrast to the preceding and following movements. The trio in the minuet was charming in itself and delightful'y played, reminding one of musettes so dear to the French composers in the 18th century.

Emanuel Bach was a fine fellow in his day, but more interesting music by him than the concerto, written originally for piano, harpsichord and a small orchestra, has been heard at these concerts; witness the orchestral concerto brought out here by Mr. Koussevitzky last October. It was not the fault of those admirable pianists, Messrs. Maier and Pattison, nor was it due to the conductor and his men, that the music itself seemed formulated without relieving strength or beauty, no better than a mass of music composed by men of Emanuel Bach's period whose names even are now forgotten except by indefatigable biographers.

The music by Messrs. Bliss and Hill was composed expressly for the two pianists. One of the pieces would have been enough, especially as they were followed by Ravel's rhapsodic treatment of a waltz in the Viennese manner. Mr. Bliss was fortunate in coming first on the program, for after the performance, the element of surprise was lacking. Mr. Hill was fortunate in coming second, for his more normal pages—they would be considered more normal by many—came after Mr. Bliss's wild measures to which, however, the hearers responded nobly as shock absorbers. It appears from Mr. Bliss's own statement that the combination of string instruments and piano is repugnant to his sense of hearing; therefore, in this concerto he eschewed all strings and wrote for two pianos, wood-wind, brass and percussion instruments. We take it for granted that the sounds thus produced yesterday would be harmonious to his ear. The pianos he regards as two "great arabesque-making machines." Did he smile ironically when he wrote that the designs for these machines were "conceived for virtuosi pianists or pianola players."

Mr. Hill's piece is light and agreeable music, a little spun out, considering the ideas contained therein. If one asks whether it suited the supposed dignity of a Symphony concert, the answer would be that the applause incited by this Scherzo and Mr. Bliss's extraordinary Concerto was more enthusiastic than any that has followed a superb performance of a masterpiece for many months.

And let us not take music too seriously, especially in the holiday season. Jazz is now in high favor. Composers are tempted to experiment in this field. Mr. Hill's Scherzo is a product of the field. Mr. Bliss's Concerto is not easily classified. He says it is to be regarded as "sound, and nothing else." If it is often "sound and fury, signifying nothing," there are pages—perhaps one should say moments—of genuine and individual beauty. Mr. Bliss is not a man to be flippantly dismissed as a poseur, a freak. He has been consistent in the carrying out of his musical convictions. He has ideas; he has unusual ways of expressing them. Whether Stravinsky has influenced him is not to the point. There are few of the greatest composers who have not been influenced by predecessors or contemporaries.

These new pieces demanded a virtuoso performance on the part of all concerned and the demand was fully met.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a dazzling reading of Ravel's "Waltz." By reason of the brilliant instrumentation, the diabolical cleverness, the infinite gradations of color and dynamics, one easily forgets the comparative insignificance of the strictly musical ideas.

An unusual concert, one that excited an audience that filled the hall completely, a concert from which we took away a grateful recollection of Haydn's Symphony and Ravel's "Waltz" as interpreted by Mr. Koussevitzky and performed by the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, Suite from the opera "Christmas Eve" (first time in Boston); Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Rigel, Symphony, D major (first time in America); Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps."

TWO NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Concertos for Two Pianos by Bliss and Hill

Two of the pieces at yesterday's Symphony concert were played for the first time in public, a concerto for two pianos by Arthur Bliss, known here by his "A Colour Symphony" heard last season; and a scherzo for two pianos and orchestra by Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard. The soloists, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, besides the relatively inconspicuous piano parts in these numbers also played an arrangement of a concerto by Philip Emanuel Bach, new to Boston. A Symphony in G major by Haydn (B and H No 13) and Ravel's "La Valse" rounded out a program which wholly and happily ignored the 19th century.

The audience liked it all very much, though they did not take the new pieces as seriously as they might have done.

Everybody chuckled after the scherzo with a spontaneity not often heard at these concerts, especially when Mr Koussevitzky, unable to see Mr Hill in the audience, shrugged his shoulders and smiled his inability to get the composer to share the applause. Then Mr Maier said plaintively "We are looking for Mr Hill," but still the modest composer refused to put himself on public view.

Mr Hill in this scherzo is avowedly experimenting with what in his opinion are "the best traits of the jazz style," though he disclaims the belief in a wholesale assimilation for that style as the only hope for the future of American music. He discovered to his surprise after he finished the piece that it is in first movement sonata form. Like the other music by him heard in former seasons, this scherzo of Mr Hill's is carefully and competently written. But as an attempt to capture the rhythmic vitality and the artless melody of jazz it is ineffective.

Mr Hill dabbles in the rhythms of jazz, without venturing on the remorseless iteration that is the essence of jazz. He does repeat his scraps of second hand popular melody, his themes, until one is utterly weary of them. The orchestration has not the color or the interweaving rhythms that Paul Whiteman's orchestra so admirably illustrates.

If we are to have jazz at the symphony, let it be the real thing by Irving Berlin, or such unacademic developments from it as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," which really should be included on a future program, if it can be rearranged for symphony orchestra.

Bliss this time disclaims any program for his piece. Instead of nonsense about colors and other nonmusical phenomena, he says merely that "it is to be regarded as sound, and nothing else." He adds that he has not used strings at all because he believes that their tone does not blend with that of the piano, and that the whole concerto is developed from a single motive.

This concerto has the rhythmic nervous stridency of Stravinsky's climaxes. Instead of his more delicate lyrics, as in "Le Sacre," Bliss has taken the tone of what one might call the jazz romanza for the lulls. If the piece were condensed it would make a deeper impression, as there are redundancies. The ideas and the musical idiom are, however, fresh and vivid.

Koussevitzky, aided by Maier and Pattison, gave eloquent interpretations of these numbers. The Bach concerto, in its modern dress, was extraordinarily lovely for two movements, only to end with a rather conventional and trivial finale. Mr Pattison's cadenza, written for the first movement, was effective, granted the use of cadenzas at all. The skill of the two pianists in ensemble was as always, extraordinary.

Koussevitzky overstressed Haydn's music. Haydn does not need to be modernized. He will always be "Papa Haydn," naive but never dull. Why try to make him as energetic as Honegger's locomotive? Ravel's "La Valse" has been played here before, but never with the imaginative insight and emotional gusto Koussevitzky imparted to yesterday's performance. The Viennese rhythms in the piece underlined the composer's ironic comment on the era when "La Valse" was written, 1914-1918. Or, so it seemed. P. R.

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitzky will give his eagerly awaited interpretation of Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" at this week's Symphony concerts. This music heard at two pairs of concerts last season under Monteux made an extraordinary impression and roused more discussion than any other new piece in a decade.

In reviewing the Symphony concert of Dec 12 the Globe reviewer remonstrated about giving programs without either a symphony or a work of equivalent length and depth. This week Koussevitzky is giving two Symphonies, by Schubert and by a forgotten 18th Century composer, Riegel; both of them brief, and on top of that the "Rites of Spring." If he would only persevere in giving substantial programs many people would be delighted and others, perhaps, bored.

But do those persons who cannot endure any but brief and not too familiar pieces belong in Symphony concert audiences at all? Somebody ought to start a series of "Highbrow Pops" for them, with all the latest trifles from Paris, London, and Vienna on the program, by such composers as John Ireland, Bax, Goossens, Satie, Milhaud, Cassella, Respighi, Josef Markxs, Carlos Salzedo, who purvey the latest modes of salon music.

Pizzetti, Honegger, Holst, Stravinsky and the other real moderns including Schoenberg, Bartok and others not yet well represented on our programs, belong, of course, on Symphony concert programs. Koussevitzky is quite right in offering the 20th century piece at every concert. But, as Koussevitzky in making his Boston programs also always remembers, standard music has the right to the lion's share of the concert.

It is also a pity that the concerts of the Boston Symphony do not last two hours under Koussevitzky as they used to under Dr Muck. Does any person bored by over an hour and a quarter of music from the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky really belong in the audience at all? It is no crime to dislike orchestral music or music in general. The crime is to pretend you like it when you don't.

In fact the only people who have a real right to be bored at concerts are the music teachers and music reviewers who are overdosed with music all their lives long. But concerts are not intended for audiences professionally interested in music. They are for people to whom music comes as a solace after their regular [illegible]

RUSSIAN LEADER STIRS NEW YORK

Former Double Bass Player Creates Furore As Conductor Of Symphony

What music critics see as rivalry between famous orchestral conductors has been heightened by the debut in New York City of Serge Koussevitsky as director of the Boston Symphony. The metropolis, already engrossed in its three resident orchestras with their noted conductors, had further been thrilled by the virtuosity of Leopold Stokowski, leader of the Philadelphia orchestra. That visiting band had thereby largely usurped the place of the Boston symphony after its decline owing to the wartime misadventures of its former conductor, Karl Muck. That is to say, the one-time full houses—sold out by subscription—of the Boston players had descended to Stokowski and his Philadelphia men. With the coming of its Russian leader, Koussevitsky, the Boston orchestra becomes again town talk and New York faces the enlivennig prospect of standing-room-only for both visiting ensembles besides the devoted publics, respectively, of its Philharmonic and New York symphony, as well as the newer State symphony.

The conductors of the two visiting orchestras are contrasted as to methods by a writer for The New York Times. Says he:

"The personality of Stokowski is a little sharper of outline and perhaps harder of substance than that of his colleague. He is more of the martinet, it is said, with his men; they nevertheless admire him. In rehearsal Stokewski goes relentlessly and impersonally for what he wants. He usually sits on a high stool, with a carafe of water by his side, and works persistently, unromantically, with the most impersonal ardor for his artistic ends. He is oblivious to anything but the fact that there is a human machine before him that can, must and will carry out his designs.

"This does not mean that he lacks emotional quality, or that, in performance, he fails to pour out nervous force and expend physical energy in a manner that might dumfound an iron-jawed business man or an athlete if they could go through a similar experience. Quite the contrary. He appears on the platform with an effect that is native to him, yet also, without doubt, well calculated for its impression on the audience. That is, he emerges quite suddenly from the wings, walks quickly to the conductor's stand, where the orchestra is completely prepared for him, raises his baton and begins almost before his audience has caught its breath. In New York he conducts everything from memory. In Philadelphia he plays certain works from score. Interpreting music, his slender and erect figure, the decision of his gestures and the generally electrical quality of the man are familiar. They never fail to evoke results.

"Koussevitsky's methods are, in a certain large way, a little less precise and intensive. He is a man of boiling enthusiasms, of much sensibility and of generous and buoyant disposition. He has always done things in a big way.

"Koussevitsky, the conductor, is acutely the master of himself when he leads the orchestra. His blood seems to run hot and cold at once. He will stir the men to a frenzy of enthusiasm and keep them at a white heat for hours. All the time he is watching the smallest details and he will stop the whole excited band at any second, for any number of times, to analyze in the most frigid and deliberate manner a technical detail or a shading that is not precisely what he wishes. He will at times exhort his men and give them some little illustrations of what he wants.

"He treats them as companions and colleagues, but not too much as colleagues, retaining control, causing not only respect but even trepidation from those who do not exactly obey him.

"Koussevitsky gained admission to the conservatory by promising to study the double bass, an instrument that happened to be much needed at that time in the conservatory orchestra. He played the double bass as no man born in Russia—or perhaps anywhere else—had made it sound before."

A FAMOUS TOUR DOWN THE VOLGA

Legends Have Arisen About This Serge Koussevitzky Affair.

FAMOUS CONDUCTOR HERE FEBRUARY 1

Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra at Capitol Theater.

There are a number of interesting episodes in the career of Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to appear at the Capitol Theater here on Sunday February 1. But probably there is no incident so entirely out of the ordinary, as the musical world goes, as his three trips down the Volga. There might have been more, but as extra-musical disturbances would have it, his tour in the spring of 1914 was his last.

Some legends have arisen about these Volga tours. One is that the concerts were free. They were not. Koussevitzky never patronized these most unusual of symphony publics. They paid the regular theater prices, listened to the concerts in their own town theaters; and were served with regular symphony programs.

Even with box-office accounts, Koussevitzky's Volga tours involved an appalling deficit. It is no simple matter to hire a hundred fine musicians, charter a steamer with accomodations for two hundred (counting musicians' wives, crew and friends), and sail for 3500 miles, stopping at towns of all sorts along the way. The tour lasted about four weeks.

Such an excursion was of course a chance for a Russian to study his people, and it is not surprising that Stanislavsky of the Russian Art Theater was the guest of one of these tours. Soriabin also made the journey and had the unique experience of observing his Symphonies suddenly thrust upon an absolutely untutored and incredibly receptive people. Edward Risler went along, and played in Beethoven's two standard piano concertos. Koussevitzky gave them such symphonies as Beethoven's 3rd and 7th, Rachmaninoff's 2nd, Tchaikovsky's 5th, Liszt's "Maseppa", Rimsky Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture, etc. In a word, the programs were such as are regularly attended by the musically sophisticated in any great metropolis.

A. M. Abell, a guest on the last tour, thus describes the effect which this music made:

"I was deeply interested in observing the effect that such music, magnificently played, made on those audiences. Although musically uncultured they were very intelligent and highly receptive. They displayed an instinctive feeling far the lofty and the beautiful and reacted to Koussevitzky's spirited readings as a high strung horse does to a master hand at the bridle.

The enthusiasm was genuine and spontaneous and the auditors listened with rapt attention. It was like watching the face of an unspoiled child while listening to a beautiful fairy tale and, indeed, to those Russians on the remote Volga this was a veritable fairyland of beauty that Koussevitzky revealed to them. Before this advent they had never heard a symphony orchestra and had never even seen many of the instruments. At Saratow, a deputation of the citizens called on Koussevitzky at his hotel and requested that he place the harps at the front of the stage at the concert in order that the people could see and admire those beautiful golden instruments.

A few hundred miles north of Astrakhan we visited a tribe of Kalmucks, a wild nomadic people living in tents something after the manner of our Indians. Strange to say, these half-savage people were worshippers of Buddha and carried a Buddhist Temple about with them on their wanderings over the trackless steppes. When the tribe saw the big steamer approaching, their shore, they thought that the Czar had come to make them a visit and they turned out in full force to welcome us. The men proved to be very friendly and I took some interesting snapshots of them, but the women were very shy and would not be photographed, believing that the camera was an instrument of the devil."

The local concert will be given under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick. The seat sale is now in progress and tickets may be obtained at Sedgwick & Casey's music store No. 139 Asylum street.

Rachmaninoff as Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The second concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 2. Serge Koussevitzky, the much-applauded new conductor of the orchestra, will open the evening with the fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," of his countryman, Tchaikovsky, a score with which the conductor has made a particularly vivid impression in Europe. A novelty will be a suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), descriptive music of De Falla, the noted Spanish composer, which is replete with characteristic colorings and rhythms of Spain. This music has had its first American performance under Koussevitzky's direction.

The soloist of the evening will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great pianist and composer, who will appear in both capacities when he performs his second concerto with the orchestra. The concert will close with Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

Koussevitzky Program for Jan. 2 Concert Here.

The second concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 2. Serge Koussevitzky, the much applauded new conductor of the orchestra, will open the evening with "Francesca da Rimini," by Tchaikovsky, a score with which he has made a particularly vivid impression in Europe. A novelty will be a suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), descriptive music of De Falla, the noted Spanish composer, which is replete with characteristic colorings and rhythms of Spain. This music has had its first American performance under Koussevitzky's direction. The soloist of the evening will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, famous pianist and composer, who will appear in both capacities when he performs his Second Concerto with the orchestra. The concert will close with Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse."

KOUSSEVITZKY PROGRAM.

The second concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy on Friday evening, January 2. Serge Koussevitzky, the much applauded new conductor of the orchestra, will open the evening with the Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," of his countryman, Tchaikovsky, a score with which the conductor has made a particularly vivid impression in Europe. A novelty will be a Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), descriptive music of De Falla.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

Serge Koussevitzky announces the program for the second appearance in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The soloist of the evening will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who will appear in both capacities when he performs his second Concerto in C minor, with the orchestra. The program will also include Tchaikovsky's Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," a striking score which has won fresh attention and interest under the baton of Koussevitzky in Europe and America; "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), by De Falla, the distinguished Spanish composer, and Ravel's Choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 21 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
DEC 21 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
DEC 21 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
DEC 21 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 21 1924

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
DEC 21 1924

Opinions Differ Widely When Musicians Discuss Merits of Fellow Stars

Public Misses One of Most Exhilarating Features of Musical Season in Not Being Able to Gather a "Running Symposium" on Musical Matters From Visiting Artists—Serafin Praised.

By Frances Boardman.

One of the most exhilarating features of the musical season is one which, unfortunately, only a few persons can enjoy.

This is what might be called the running symposium on musical matters of the day as contributed by visiting musicians. Coming, as they do, from professional experience in many parts of Europe, as well as the United States, they represent various types and schools of musical training, and divers nationalistic attitudes, and the concensus of their opinion on any one figure or movement in the musical world (sometimes you can't arrive at a concensus, disagreements being so consistent), is apt to be extremely enlightening.

They not only are enlightening, but encouraging to those of us who sometimes puzzle a bit distressfully over the astonishing difference of musical opinion among people with tastes of a presumably equal degree of development.

Objects of Comments.

Quite naturally, it is the outstanding conductors of the day, particularly those new to America this year, who come in for the most conspicuous comment.

These, of course, include Tullio Serafin, at the Metropolitan; Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Wilhelm Furtwaengler, the Gewandhaus orchestra leader from Leipsic who is a New York guest-conductor of this season, and Bruno Walter, who is another.

In listing briefly the commentators who come most readily to mind, and their general background of training and experience, one might commence with Stefi Geyer, who was violin soloist at a symphony concert some weeks ago. Brought up in Budapest, and a pupil there of Jeno Hubay, she now lives in Zurich, the home of her husband. In the meantime, she has concertized extensively in Europe, and brings to her judgment a wealth of general culture which is not always a characteristic of even remarkable musicians.

Husband Is Pianist.

Her husband, Walter Schulthess, is a pianist, the son of a professor at the University of Zurich, and representative, generally speaking, of the Teutonic influence in training.

Jascha Heifetz needs no descriptive tag; everybody knows who he is and what is his musical status. Isa Kremer is a Russian Jewess with an Italian vocal training, and very cosmopolitan outlook and experience. Her accompanist, Leon Rosenbloom, also a Russian Jew, was transplanted at an early age to Vienna, being a product of the conservatory there and of later extensive study in Berlin.

One of the most authoritative witnesses in the group is Carlo Peroni, who is conductor for "Carmen" as Geraldine Farrar is taking it about the country. A leader of recognized ability, he also is a man of keen analytical faculties. (Perhaps conductors have to be!)

Called a Charlatan.

Now, then, about Koussevitzky, present upholder of the Boston Symphony orchestra's fame. One of these artists, one who has heard him many times, both as conductor and as cello soloist, calls him the cleverest charlatan now on the concert stage. He recalls how, when he appeared as cello virtuoso, he would come on the stage carelessly removing his immaculate white gloves, which he threw to a waiting lackey, bow and glance around much after the manner of a magician about to do his tricks, and commence to play.

"I think, though," he added, "that his showmanship is good enough to hold popularity pretty firmly."

Another verdict is that Koussevitzky is all right, except for a soulless precision and pedantry. These are the two extremes of opinion concerning him; the others fall into the space between.

About Furtwaengler there seems something very like unanimity. Except for one complaint that, at times, he overstresses instrumental precision, the general report is that he is one of the world's really great conductors and that America is fortunate in having his services for even a short time.

Serafin Is Praised.

Tullio Serafin is variously described as good, very good, and great.

Two witnesses explained that since they heard him at La Scala directly after performances under Toscanini, he was at the disadvantage that any conductor must be under such circumstances. They agree, however, that his training under the incomparable Arturo is bound to reflect large benefit upon the situation at the Metropolitan.

Bruno Walter, about whom St. Paul music-lovers already have had an opportunity to make up their minds, calls forth unanimous praise as a symphony conductor, with the added comment that he has no equals when it comes to Wagner.

Well—it is interesting and valuable, even if not final. And of course the best thing about music is that it so magnificently overrides finality—in the making of it, in performance, and in appraisal.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
DEC 21 1924

The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, will make its second New York visit of the season next week, playing the following programs:

Carnegie Hall, Thursday, January 1, 8:15 p. m.:

Overture to "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
"Unfinished" Symphony.....Schubert
Symphony in D major.....Riegel
Le Sacre du Printemps.....Stravinsky

Carnegie Hall, Saturday, January 3, 2:30 p. m., and Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday, January 2, 8:15 p. m.:

Concerto grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10.....Handel
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Piano Concerto No. 2, in C minor.....Rachmaninoff
Sergei Rachmaninoff.
Suite from "El Amor Brujo".....De Falla
La Valse.....Ravel

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. Suite from the opera "Christmas Eve," Rimsky Korsakov; "Unfinished Symphony," Schubert; Symphony in D major, Riegel (first time here); "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rites of Spring"), Stravinsky. There will be no soloist.

According to the New York Times Serge Koussevitzky has sent to Paris for the score of Honegger's opera, "Roi David," which was one of the musical sensations of Paris during the last season. "Roi David" was written in 1922 in the space of two months and first given at the Theatre de Jorat in Switzerland. Honegger rescored it for large concert orchestra. Excepting his symphony, it is the longest and most substantial composition he has produced. "Roi David" is scored for orchestra, chorus and solo voices. The text is taken from the Psalms, parts of the Old Testament and other sources.

...MPHONY PROGRAM
The following program will be performed at the Symphony con-

...rt's next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Suite from the opera "Christmas Eve," by Rimsky-Korsakov; Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony"; Rigel's symphony in D major, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

CAPITOL

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
DEC 21 1924

"Serge Koussevitzky has ceased to be a fable in [redacted] York. With the two concerts which served to auspicitate the Boston symphony's Manhattan series last week, he became a quite tangible actuality instead of a somewhat remote object of reclame. And in this actualisation, there was a winnowing of wings —the wings of myths taking flight."

In the above paragraph lifted from musical America we see how easily the New York critic assumes astute Bostonese when speaking of the big Bean City band. In the following paragraphs of the same article it becomes evident that the new Russian leader of the Hub forces pleased the Gothamites immensely.

Speaking of Boston, we notice that they are raising there a guarantee fund of $120,000 to entice the Chicago Civic Opera company to give a series of fifteen operatic works in Boston between Jan. 26 and Feb. 7. Last year the guarantors had to pay 23 per cent. of their subscriptions. Indications are that the assessment will be lower this year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 21 1924

The second concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony will take place in the Academy on Friday evening, Jan. 2. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra, will open the program with the fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" of Tschaikowsky. A novelty will be the suite "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), descriptive music of De Falla, noted Spanish composer, which is replete with characteristic colorings and rhythms of Spain. This score has had its first American performance under Koussevitzky's direction. The soloist of the evening will be Sergei Rachmaninoff pianist and composer, who will perform his second Concerto for Piano With Orchestra. The concert will close with Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SYRACUSE
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
DEC 21 1924

Boston's 20 Concerts Sell Out in New York

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, regarded in the days of Dr. Karl Muck as the greatest symphonic organization in America, is once again looked upon as leader in that line, with the assumption of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor.

So sensational was the orchestra's 1924-1925 debut in New York this year the entire twenty concerts are sold out solid in advance and four extra concerts will be given in New York. In addition, about half a dozen will be played in Brooklyn, while Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington are also on the Boston's visiting list for four concerts a season.

Pierre Monteux was conductor last year. It is generally conceded he did much to rehabilitate an organization practically shattered after Dr. Muck left America amid the frenzy of anti-German feeling which swept the country during the war days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 21 1924

Programs are announced for New York's second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 1 and 3. A feature of the Thursday evening concert will be Stravinsky's "Le sacré du printemps," and at the matinee concert, a new suite from "El Amor Brujo," or "Love the Sorcerer," an opera by the Spanish composer de Falla.

Sergej Rachmaninoff will be soloist in his Second piano concerto at the matinee, as well as at a Friday concert in Brooklyn.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: A Suite from the opera "Christmas Eve" by Rimsky-Korsakov; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, B minor; a Symphony in D major by Rigel, an 18th century composer; and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 21 1924

Dusolina Giannini, soprano, made her Boston début on Dec. 1 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Koussevitzki.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
GLOBE
DEC 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY
DUE HERE DEC. 28TH

Lovers of real musical entertainment will have in store for themselves a concert of exceptional value when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with Ethel Leginska, pianist, appear at the Empire theatre Sunday afternoon, December 28th.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra needs no introduction to the music lovers, but in the new conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, a rare treat is in store. Mr. Koussevitsky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figure among his concerts. Serge Koussevitsky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is named as the only truly great conductor America has been boasting of hearing.

Appearing on this concert is Ethel Leginska, the Paderewski of women pianists. She is recognized as the finest pianist of the younger generation. She has won this enviable reputation by a mastery which combines vivid dynamic force with the softest melodic touch. These powers serve Leginska the interpretive artist and the composer of daring scores which have attracted much attention. She has been conducting the orchestra of Germany and France with conspicuous success.

Seats are now on sale at the box office and the prices range from fifty cents to two dollars, free from tax. Reservations can be made by calling 3929.

...RIVER, MASS.
GLOBE
DEC 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Empire Theatre Sunday afternoon December 28th. The program follows:

Serge Koussevitsky, Conductor.

PROGRAMME

Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival".
Wagner—Bacchanale from..... ..... "Thannhauser"
Liazt—Fantacia on Hungarian Folk-tunes, for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64.

Soloist, Ethel Leginska

Ethel Leginska is often called the finest pianist of the younger generation. She has won this enviable reputation by a mastery which combines vivid dynamic force with the softest melodic touch. These powers serve Leginska the interpretive artist and the composer of daring scores which have attracted much attention. Her tours of America have included appearances with this Orchestra in Boston. In the last two seasons she has extended her fame through Europe, and not only as a pianist composer. She has been conducting the orchestra of Germany and France with conspicuous success.

Seats are now on sale at the box office and early reservation are urged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
DEC 23 1924

MUSIC

By F. W. S.

WHILE the critics outside of Boston have been, on the whole, rather cautious in their forecasts of the future achievements to be expected of Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and especially in regard to whether or not he will prove the man to bring this old musical organization back to its former glories, which may be said to have reached their culmination under the direction of Karl Muck and which declined under the blighting influence of war hysteria, there is a rather strong intimation or expectancy that a man has been found at last who appears capable of such an accomplishment.

The stories printed about the new star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament of this country are already legion. They laud the conductor's mastery over players, his technical resourcefulness, his poise, his self-restraint, his undoubted ability to secure fine effects that few orchestras under any leader achieve today, and his open-mindedness which prompts him to give much prominence to modern and even ultra modern works. Around him has also been built up a great mass of more or less authentic lore about his early struggles, his wanderings, his filling of a very subordinate position of double-bass, his tours with this instrument in recital and other details of his life.

These stories invest him with more or less romance, but from them stands out the apparently indubitable fact that his is a personality of uncommon force, of capacity for exerting that subtle power which only the truly great are able to wield and which suggest possession of that relatively rare faculty for getting the best out of his men that is in them and in particular to mold them into a most homogenous and responsive whole.

THEREFORE, while the New York critics were rather reserved in their estimates of what might be expected of the new head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on his first appearance there, preferring to wait and see what progress he would make, the undercurrent of opinion none the less seemed to be that at last there had risen a director who would restore the prestine renown of the big organization from the Hub, which became firmly intrenched in the position of the premier orchestral body of the country and held this place under a series of talented leaders perhaps to a considerable extent because of the clarity of purpose, the determination, the definiteness of aim and the intelligent liberality of the late Colonel Higginson, who, being a rich man, chose to expend his wealth in the building up and maintenance of a medium of musical expression of the finest sensitiveness and the highest artistic perfection.

IF anyone following musical matters had any doubt as to the exact value of the director to an orchestra, other things being equal and the means at hand to secure the best available talent, the history of the Boston Symphony ought to crystallize his views and enable him to arrive at a very definite conclusion, this being that any orchestra in its spiritual, its interpretative and its expressive elements, as distinct from the more patent facility of execution, reflects very accurately the qualities of the man who wields the baton.

The Boston Symphony for a long time stood in first place, because it had the benefit of leaders, each of whom, in his own particular way, was a master. These leaders differed strikingly and seemingly unemotional, but through Emil Paur and the sturdy-minded but broad Wilhelm Gericke, who drew tone pictures with bold strokes, being totally unlike the romantic Arthur Nikisch, and the diminutive and apparently stoic Dr. Muck, being distinguished from both of them, not to mention other noted leaders. All of them gave something to the orchestra which helped to make it great and put the unmistakable stamp of genius as well as authority upon it.

NOW LEADS DESTINIES OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

tralto; Louis Cremona, tenor, and Hubert J. Sturm, barytone. The Proper of the Pontifical mass as well as the Christmas vesper service will be sung by the St. Mary's Seminary choir. At the Pontifical mass also a processional march by the late Sir Asger Hamerik, at one time director of the Peabody Conservatory, will be played.

234
Globe
Transcript
Dec 27

he Boston Daily

ON. TUESDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 23, 1924—TWENTY-F

GIFTS THAT SHOULDN'T BE GIVEN

By GENE MACK.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky will bring out at the Symphony concerts tomorrow and Saturday evening a little symphony by Henri Joseph Rigel, a German composer, who taught at Mannheim and Stuttgart, went to Paris when he was 27 years old and lived there until he died in 1799. There he was famous as a player of the clavecin; he was a popular teacher; his symphonies were composed and performed; he wrote much chamber music and about a dozen little operas. The performance by the symphony, which is more in the nature of a suite, will be the first in this country. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it at his concert in Paris on May 3, 1923.

He will also bring out a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve." The subject of the opera is the same as that of Tchaikovsky's "Caprices d'Oxane," which as "Christmas Eve" was performed at the Boston Opera House by a Russian Opera Company. The Polonaise from this Suite was played at a pop concert last season.

The program will also include Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

I RECALL

Notes and Lines:

CHILDREN'S MUSIC: WORKABLE THEORY, WISE APPLICATION

PRECEPT AND EXAMPLE, TIMELY FOR BOSTON

Our Spreading Concerts for Young People —Background, Interest and Outcome as Chicago Sees Them—Ways and Means as Mr. Schelling in New York Has Devised Them—The Screen as Well as the Players

JAS never before in this town concerts for children and young folk are upon it; for all the world (of which Boston is sometimes said to be a suburb) has lately discovered that a new generation of listeners to good music must be tempted into the way along which it should go. The Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky benignant, is traversing its usual series. At the instigation of high-placed ladies, with a substantial contingent of that same orchestra for band, Mr. Schelling will begin a second series in January at Jordan Hall. The Harvard Glee Club sings choral pieces to the youngsters. So, besides, does the Handel and Haydn Society. "Hours of Talk and Music" are also in prospect for the children at the Copley-Plaza, with a pianist or a singer to entertain (and instruct) them. To and fro upon many minds and in many mouths goes debate of these ventures. There is need of wisdom in the arrangement of them, of discreet expectation from them. Already sound theory and wise practice are afoot. Mr. Eric de Lamarter, assistant conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, has spoken the one; Mr. Schelling, at children's concerts by the Philharmonic Society in New York, has exemplified the other. It is timely to listen to Mr. de Lamarter, and with the mind's eye, to watch Mr. Schelling.

Wise Purpose

Said the Chicagoan last summer when he was shaping orchestral concerts for children at Ravinia Park, a suburb and rendezvous of that city: "Children's concerts are dismissed too often by one or another observation. Either they are regarded as brief amusement for the youngsters, or they are solmenly considered as potential culture-makers: a deeply plotted scheme for recruiting concert audiences for the next generation. . . . Naturally, the idea of interesting the children is foremost in the mind of the directors. Just as naturally, too, it will be an abiding regret if there is no trace of growth in appreciation of music as a result of such a series of concerts. But a concert is not a sort of culture-stuffing clinic. No one has ever been able to inject culture of any sort. And if this fact be true with mature And if this fact be true with mature audiences, it is doubly true with children.

"First of all, the director of a children's concert is dealing with the elementary psychology of the savage; since children are as free as a savage from the qualifying background that adults have made their instinct through much experience. The child at a concert likes or does not like, and this without a single modifying influence. Your adult may have a dozen points of contact—workmanship, acquaintance with a composer or an interpreter, a knowledge of the story, or interest in the mechanism of the performance. Not so the child. He likes or does not like with spontaneous frankness—intuitively, almost brutally. Therefore the first essential to interest and understanding is a background, some interpretation of what it's all about in terms of the child's own perspective. Once that is established his attention is arrested and, the gods being kind, held.

"Two methods of creating this background, this extraneous interest, are open. First, most music suitable for the occasion has its related story. Secondly, the instrumental ensemble is provocative of picturesque demonstration. It may be, as in excerpts from 'Hansel and Gretchel,' that the music is built around folk and children's songs, some of them internationally known. The story may be that of a fairy tale all children know, and the personages may be children. It may be a page from Hay[illegible] which gives the [illegible]ance for the inclusion o[illegible] that composer's [illegible]ooyish disappointments and struggles for education toward his ordained art.

"Again, the children (and the small boys especially) have an insatiable curiosity which never dies out in the small boys grown up, for sight of the wheels going 'round. And that is where the individual members of the orchestra come in—Mr. Ixe with his French horn, Mr. Zed and his bassoon, Mr. Tau and his big fiddle, and all the others that form the instrumental family. All of them come in for an illuminating object-lesson on the use and duties of the intriguing contraptions of which they are the masters.

"Psychologically in these two elements is the basis of an actual musical progress, and, as such, they are worth more than all the carefully planned direct attempts as teaching the youngster the fundamentals of appreciation. For they provide the background, and they provide a working knowledge of the medium which are the instruments. The sum of the two [illegible] through experience, the basis of taste. And

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 24 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in one concert in Hartford this season after an absence of two years. This supreme musical event, incidently the only orchestral concert of the season, comes to Hartford under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick, long and favorably known to local theatergoers. The beautiful and spacious Capitol Theater will house this important musical event which means that minimum price will be charged for a maximum of entertainment and comfort. The concert is scheduled for Sunday afternoon, February 1st.

The coming of this famous orchestra is made doubly interesting because it introduces the orchestra's new conductor and one of the world's greatest musicians Serge Koussevitzky, newly come to the conductor's desk of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fresh from his triumphs in Paris. Mr. Koussevitzky is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris and this is his first visit to America. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness and as an artist of impassioned convictions. Serge Koussevitzky is the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Previous to this season he was named as the only truly great conductor whom America had not heard.

The seats will be placed on sale Monday morning at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail orders will also be accepted. All orders and checks should be directed to Frank A. Sedgwick.

discriminating musical intelli[illegible]

Fruitful Pr[illegible]

Wrote Mr.
Herald-Tribune
Schelling at his was standing on Carnegie Hall c a pocket edition chestra, a reading hind him was a stereopticon had thrown a picture on showing the seating plan of an orchestra.
A moment's study of this would have taught you just where the bassoons sit, and where the kennel of the trombone is,
and the lair of the double-basses, and all the other wild animals of the orchestral herd.

"Mr. Schelling was telling his quiet and obviously engrossed listeners about the most important of the animals; the family of fiddles, big and little; only Mr. Schelling, being a poet and an artist, called the assemblage that surrounded him "a garden of singing flowers—the only garden," he remarked, in which one could find no weeds. Mr. Schelling described the various instruments of the string family—the violins, violas, violoncellos, double-basses.

"As Mr. Schelling talked, the screen behind him illustrated and elucidated his remarks You saw pictures of fiddle-bows and violins and 'cellos; a picture of Paganini, the demon-fiddler; of Bach and his houseful of children. And one remembered what Mr. Schelling had written concerning his purpose in using this method:

'As we derive three-quarters of our knowledge through our eyes, why not use this means to interest children and impress them doubly—audibly and visibly? Bearing this in mind, I have had some 300 slides made of the various instruments in the orchestra and slides of the composers and of the principal themes and works performed. As only the children in the first few rows would be able to see the violin, oboe or other instruments presented by the soloist, the throwing of his magnified slides of that particular instrument on a screen will show it to all. The children will be able to see and tell at a glance the difference between an oboe and a clarinet, and at the same time hear the difference in sound. To see what the composer looks like will give an added interest and the themes on the screen will enable the children to follow the music better and so thoroughly familiarize themselves with the themes.'

"It worked out in just that way. For as Mr. Schelling talked—in that casual, intimate, unpatronizing and wholly charming way of his—the pictures on the screen explained to the eye. And some of the first string players of the orchestra played illustrative passages on their several instruments, demonstrating tone-color, range and so forth. Then Mr. Schelling sat down at the piano, and the first violin stood up, and together they played the famous Air of Bach from the Suite in D major. After that, all the strings took it up, and Mr. Schelling, moving from the pianist's stool to the conductor's stand, led his men through the remainder of the piece.

"In this way they traversed the program, which lasted only an hour and a quarter. The purpose of the concerts was to familiarize the young people with the or-

Other articles offered Feather Neckpieces ore Handkerchiefs and Belts at extreme

Infants' De
2% Reduction O
Enish Socks, tan a
2 to 7. Were $1
% Reduction o

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Mr. Monteux in London

THE British Broadcasting Company gave Mr. Monteux an "excellent orchestra" when he conducted for it in London, a fortnight ago, through a concert of symphonic music. "Chausson's rarely heard Symphony in B-flat was the chief number," said The Times next day, "and it was good to hear under a French conductor who understands it thoroughly and sympathizes with its moods. Though Mr. Monteux may be regarded as a specialist in French symphonic music, his experience after five years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of the widest, and in this program he began with Respighi's 'Old Dances' and ended with Brahms and Strauss. The Variations on a Theme by Haydn were taken quickly, Number Six especially so, but they were played with admirable clearness, though not with quite the solidity which seems to belong to Brahms. The brilliance of Strauss's 'Don Juan' was exhilarating, and here Mr. Monteux managed to avoid the unpleasant suggestion of wallowing in the sentiment of the middle section, which German conductors too often allow. He preserved a clean, incisive outline throughout" More briefly The Morning Post remarked: "Mr. Monteux returns to England via America with augmented powers that now make him a conductor of weight and authority—qualities he employs to good purpose in xpressing a musical temperament of uncommon perceptiveness."

Trailing Clouds of Glory

As hereunder, the Parisian journal, Le Figaro, recounts Mr. Koussevitzky's recent visit to New York. Less literally translated, the paragraph would lose something of flavor:

> After the grand triumphs gained by Monsieur Serge Koussevitzky in Boston, word comes of the new and exceptional success that the master (so long and so frequently active in Paris) has lately won in New York, where he conducted at the first two concerts for the season of the Boston Symphony. The New York reviewers unanimously affirm that not only was the reputation preceding him to America unexaggerated, but also that his actual success even surpassed every American anticipation. In particular, all the most considerable reviewers in New York declare that never before has that city heard so perfect and so moving an interpretation of The Nocturnes of Debussy as that given by Monsieur Koussevitzky at the inaugural concert in New York of the Boston Orchestra. In the general belief, also, the first true performance of Honegger's "Pacific" was that conducted by Monsieur Koussevitzky, though that piece had already been played four times by the New York Symphony. The audiences, which comprised all the notables ("principales notoriétés") who happened to be in New York, gave orchestra and conductor a prolonged ovation after each item of programs that also included a Symphony of Brahms, Prokoviev's "Scythian Suite," Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," the Overture to "Oberon."

Strange as it seems—no doubt by one of those oversights that haunt every newspaper office—Le Figaro fails to mark this paragraph "communiqué."

ing.

Mr. Koussevitzky proposes the following pieces for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater in Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Jan. 8.

Symphony in G major (B. and H., 13)...Haydn
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2, in E-flat major.....Lisst
(Pianist: Mr. Borovsky)
Nocturnes: "Clouds"; "Fêtes".....Debussy
Rondo for Orchestra, "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....Straus

Mr. Vincent Lopez who is [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 27 1924

Thanksgiving Week Music.

Thanksgiving week in New York was as liberally supplied with music as with turkeys. It was a period of prolific offerings to which the public responded as did the small boy to an invitation to have another piece of pie.

Leading up to these seven days was a similar number almost equally fat with musical good things, and this year proved no exception to the rule. Of course the feature of the week was the debut here of Serge Koussevitsky. It is pertinent to state in the midst of opera, symphony, chamber music, choral, recital music of every known variety there has been a bit of punctuation in the way of jazz. At least it can be called that—for want of a better term—since the program was given by Vincent Lopez and an augmented orchestra, largely along the lines of the several affairs by the Paul Whiteman orchestra which began last winter and are still going on.

Symphony Plays "Le Sacre" Again

At yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitsky conducted Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"). As when the orchestra played it last spring under Mr. Monteux, it was placed last on the program, in order that those conservatives who still consider Stravinsky a defiler of the sanctity of the temple of music might have opportunity to make graceful exits in the intermission. And many of them did—almost as many, it seemed, as when the music was first played here last January.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of "Le Sacre" surprised by its variance from Monteux's, for it is more restrained. Where Monteux made it starkly primitive, Koussevitzky makes it a subtle, sharp, sophisticated picture of savagery, no less stirring in its powerful rhythms and piercing, barbaric sounds.

For the rest of the program there was Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and, both for the first time in Boston, a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve" and Rigel's Symphony in D major. The Rimsky-Korsakov music charmed with its feathery lightness and glistening brilliance. The 18th century symphony, rather, a suite, is charming, suave, well-mannered music that never raises its voice above drawing-room pitch and therefore served as balm to those who disliked Stravinsky and his 20th century music.

NOVELTIES IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Only superlatives can characterize the performance of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. If Mr. Koussevitzky had intended his interpretation of this Symphony as a Christmas present, he could have selected nothing better.

Even Schubert of the "Unfinished" may be played too often, but such was the beauty of Mr. Koussevitzky's conception that the enjoyment was unalloyed. In this piece, as in so many other classic symphonies, Mr. Koussevitzky casts conventional readings to the winds, and plays the piece as he finds it on the printed page, and as it appeals to his artistry. He took the opening measures at a much slower tempo than is customary, but how much more beautiful and impressive they sounded. He toned down the violins and made the brass more prominent, but what a wealth of color and contrast was obtained from measures that are otherwise hackneyed.

Quite as superlative in its way was the playing of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," a piece at the opposite pole to Schubert's. When Stravinsky's famous work was first performed in Paris it started practically a riot, but Boston audiences have now heard this work [illegible] times, and aside from the fact that some persons walked out yesterday before the piece was played, and while it was played, that there was no excitement.

HOLIDAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

"Christmas Eve" Suit and a Symphony From 1770

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Rich and varied was the fare that Mr. Koussevitzky offered his hearers at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon.

And the seemingly erratic ordering of the programme served once more to emphasize the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky has no need to rely upon chronology, or upon any other stereotyped classification to gain unity, contrast and climax.

CROWNED BY THE "RITE"

Since this pair of concerts falls within the circle of "Christmas week," Mr. Koussevitzky set first upon his programme a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Christmas Eve"; followed its light charms and rich sonorities with the romantic glow of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; next harked back to 1770 with a "new" Symphony by the little-known Henri Joseph Rigel; and crowned the whole with Stravinsky's cataclysmic "Rite of Spring."

To discuss first the novel pieces of the afternoon, the excerpts from Rimsky's opera, itself unknown to America, proved music of ready appeal that is yet not superficial; music not remarkably imaginative, yet by no means without the atmosphere that Gogol's tale suggests; and music scored with the composer's unerring feeling for instrumental coloring. And a festive note, likewise appropriate to the holiday season, sounded in the brilliant Polonaise, already heard here at a Pop Concert, that brought the suite to an end.

Of Dainty Elegance

Already long is the list of Mr. Koussevitzky's resurrections from the 18th century, and among the happiest of them is this tiny Symphony of Rigel, music quite exceeding in interest the mild and gentle Symphony of Boccherini, or Corelli's stodgy Concerto of last week's concerts. Almost too slight to be termed a Symphony at all, Rigel's little work has a Gallic elegance and nicety, while the final Presto might credibly have been signed by Mozart.

To turn, then, to the familiar compositions—for Stravinsky's epochal work, yesterday heard for the fifth time in Boston, may be now be accounted familiar music in Symphony Hall—Schubert's matchless fragment received yesterday a performance of surpassing eloquence and beauty.

New Beauties in Shubert

Not for long has Boston harbored a conductor wholly responsive to Schubert. With him the Catholic Muck seemed singularly unsympathetic, and although Mr. Monteaux had abundant feeling for what may be termed the facts of his music, its poetry and its romance in measure ever escaped him Almost as a revelation, then, came yesterday's glamourous performance. In the first movement were perceived new depths; in the Andante instrumental voices, oboe, horn and clarinet were as tongues of gold. How Schubert would have rejoiced in such playing of the music that harsh Destiny would not let him hear.

Vastly More Eloquent

And in the "Rite of Spring" Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished yet another marvel. In advance it seemed reasonable to suppose that this music, at once stark and complex, direct in its appeal yet intricate of facture, would sound much the same from any conductor capable of directing it at all. Not so. From the mysterious opening to the overpowering close came ever new beauties and new intensities, new subtleties and new excitements. More strictly musical, more homogeneous seemed the "Rite of Spring" yesterday and withal vastly more eloquent of all that Stravinsky would express in it.

Another 10 years may pass before the "Rite of Spring" may sound as normal, as accustomed, as the once baffling music of Strauss or Debussy sounds today. Already, however, enough of its strangeness has passed from it amply to prove that in that alone lies not its extraordinary sway over the responsive and open-minded listener.

Nor should these comments close without a word for the virtuosity of the orchestra. Yesterday in such desperate tests as the music of Rimsky-Korsakov and Rigel, Schubert and Stravinsky, it quite outdid itself.

SYMPHONY GIVES 10TH CONCERT

Rimsky-Korsakov Suite Is Heard in Boston for the First Time

KOUSSEVITZY HAS CONTRAST PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov, Suite from the opera "Christmas Eve"; Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Rigel, Symphony, D major; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The Polonaise from Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite was played in Boston at a "Pop" concert last May. The other movements were heard here yesterday for the first time. The subject of the opera, based by the composer on Gogol's story, is the same as that of Tchaikovsky's "Les Caprices d' Oxane," performed here by a Russian Opera Company in 1922, but Rimsky added to the story much that was fantastical. The music heard yesterday was not of a fantastic nature. The Prelude (Christmas Eve) has two themes, the first, beautiful in its purity and serenity. (The opera begins with a scene on a moonlit night.) The orchestration is charming. In the following movement a rapid flute solo was played brilliantly by Mr. Laurent. The Polonaise, with its suave middle section, might have been written by a less gifted composer. Tchaikovsky's Polonaise in a Suite has greater pomp and swing. Years ago Theodore Thomas used to put Meyerbeer's Torchlight Dances on his programs. These pieces, composed originally for brass instruments and for the wedding festivities of Princesses of Prussia, more or less in the nature of a polonaise, seemed in the Seventies as played by Thomas's man to be the last word in splendor of stateliness. Then there is Liszt's first polonaise for piano, orchestrated by Mueller-Berghaus, once a favorite piece which even Mr. Gericke, fastidious in taste, conducted at a Symphony concert in 1887.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony has been regarded by many conductors as a purely lyrical work, and they have avoided dramatic contrasts, and passionate outbursts. As a result, the performances have often been sentimental, sugary, and—monotonous in spite of the inherent melodic beauty. The music, however, admits of a dramatic reading, and the lyric measures gain thereby. Mr. Koussevitzky began as if the opening for basses had been marked "misterioso"; as if there was even sinister foreboding, as in the famous measures for double basses that announce in Verdi's opera the coming of Othello with murder in his soul, into the bed chamber of Desdemona. There were certain liberties taken by Mr. Koussevitzky in tempo, chiefly in measures preparatory to the announcement of a new musical idea, measures of modulation. There was no slackening of pace in the song first sung by the violoncellos, a liberty taken by conductors who wish it to be read "with great expression." The simplicity of the reading yesterday made the song the more beautiful. The famous outburst after the first section of the first movement was intensely dramatic, and here the imagination of the conductor was as illuminating as the poetic spirit in which the lyric pages were conceived. If here and there in the second movement there were stretches that seemed tame—we do not refer to the exquisite pages for oboe and clarinet solos—the fault was in the music itself, for this Andante falls below the opening Allegro. No doubt it is fortunate for Schubert's fame that he did not complete the symphony. He could hardly have hoped to write a Scherzo and Finale worthy of the first movement.

This little symphony—really a suite—by Henri Joseph Rigel of the 18th century was probably performed for the first time in this country. We say probably, for much French music was played in the United States in the 18th and early in the 19th century. The symphony is simple, easy going music, without any marked distinction, yet it differs somewhat in character from the Italian and German orchestral music that was contemporaneous and of and earlier date. Mr. Koussevitzky revived this symphony at his concert in Paris on May 3, 1923; in Paris where this music was first heard. Not all of the old orchestral pieces bear revival. There is a song, "All Coons Look Alike to Me." Too many allegros of ancient days sound alike: Bach's are no exceptions. Only the giant Handel is still imposing.

Whatever may be said of honest Rigel's music it served as a contrast—and Mr. Koussevitzky revels in contrasts—to Stravinsky's extraordinary composition. It still appears after several hearings, to be chiefly remarkable for its rhythmic ingenuity and rhythmic fury. No one in these days should object to the wild dissonances. When the ballet is on the stage, the occasional cacophony, as some would have it, may assume significance. As music, not pure and simple, but impure and complex, without the scenes and the dancing on the stage, it has one grievous fault: it is not interesting, especially after the surprise of the first hearing cannot be renewed. Surprise may be the chief element of wit; it is not the chief element of music. As concert music, "The Procession of the Wise Men" is perhaps the most impressive; the work still excites curiosity. It has been rumored through the city that the composition is sensational, and as many crave excitement and find rasping of the nerves pleasurable to the soul, many were yesterday turned away.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

"RITES OF SPRING" GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky's Reading of Piece Is Delicate

Koussevitzky gave at yesterday's Symphony concert his eagerly awaited reading of the most discussed piece of music of the past decade, Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring." Monteux, who conducted the original performances of the ballet from which this orchestral suite is drawn, gave last season at two pairs of concerts a remarkably brilliant reading of "Rites of Spring." He made the piece the mose exciting, the most stimulating to the nerves, of anything he had conducted in his five years here. What one remembered afterward was the frenzied noise of the climaxes. The word which most aptly characterizes the Koussevitzky reading heard yester is "delicate."

Now, since Koussevitzky's music publishing business published "The Rites of Spring," there is much reason for believing that he, too, has firsthand knowledge of how Stravinsky intends his music to be played.

Stravinsky is himself to appear as guest conductor and piano soloist at the Symphony concerts later in the season. If he puts "Rites of Spring" on his program we shall be in possession of the authentic interpretation of the music. If any audience can possess such a thing.

But is there such a thing as an authentic interpretation of anybody's music? Would Stravinsky himself, or any composer, always conduct or play his own music in the same manner? Koussevitzky thinks not, if his conducting since he came to Boston is evidence.

Yesterday, for instance, he gave a reading of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" quite different from any other heard here. When the orchestral score says "andante con moto," as in the second movement of this symphony and the slow movement of Beethoven's C minor, Koussevitsky conducts "adagio," that is much more slowly and solemnly than the written direction indicates as the composer's intention.

Koussevitzky remembered Schubert's admiration for Beethoven, perhaps. At any rate he believed Schubert in this B minor symphony to be a dramatic composer, not a mere writer of pretty songs. There was more clarity of line, more nobility of style than one expected. So conceived the music is extraordinarily moving and never sensational.

According to Koussevitzky, it is the yearning, the passion, the mystery of youth rather than its barbaric exuberance that Stravinsky has expressed in "Rites of Spring." These qualities he made felt in his reading. One felt the mood of the primitive savage, half brute and half demigod, through the music.

One grasped the themes and the rhythms more readily in a delicate, perfectly controlled, never very noisy, yet almost painfully intense performance, guided by Koussevitzky's remarkable imagination and equally remarkable control of the men under him. Since this reading is as vital as Monteux', the fact that it differs does not really matter. Nor does it matter if Stravinsky himself leads the music otherwise.

The other numbers were new to Boston, but neither of them amounted to very much. In honor of the Christmas season the concert began with a suite from Rimsky Korsakov's opera "Christmas Eve" composed in 1894, in Rimsky's best days. If the three fragments played are fair specimens, this opera is hack work of the most banal description, utterly unworthy of the composer of "Le Coq d'Or" and "Scheerzerade." They illustrate the Russian habit of saying the same thing over and over without ever getting anywhere, or in musical terms of repeating themes without either developing or varying them.

All composers, even Bach, Beethoven and Wagner do this. Stravinsky, a Russian, does it often. Rimsky Korsakov never does anything else.

A little "symphony" by an 18th century Parisian conductor, Rigel, was another illustration of the aforesaid vice. It was really a little suite in three very brief movements, childishly simple. The pieces Mozart composed as a child of 4 are much better written and far more beautiful, as the specimens in Abert's Mozart prove. But a conduction in quest of novel music cannot always be lucky in his finds.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week, as the orchestra goes to New York.

P. R.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

296

MUSIC OF BEAUTY, MUSIC OF FRENZY, MUSIC OF TRIFLE

LONG GAMUT AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Naive and Empty Eighteenth-Century Piece — Rimsky-Korsakov Among the Stars—Mr. Koussevitzky from Song with Schubert to Savagery with Stravinsky—The Answering Orchestra

ONCE upon a time there was a collector of eighteenth-century snuff-boxes. The more of them he assembled the more interesting and remarkable did they become in his eyes. He liked to display them, one by one, to his friends; while often in company would he expatiate upon them. He was best pleased when he discovered some snuff-box that every other collector had overlooked. He fetched it home proudly; cleaned and polished it; scrutinized it until he believed it a notable snuff-box. Forthwith he gathered his friends around his table; set his treasure well in view; bade them look and admire. Possibly he was disappointed when they seemed to find it a very ordinary snuff-box in kind and, without more ado, went their ways. Thereafter, with more discretion and at longer intervals, he exhibited his "finds" to his circle and gradually it ceased to call him (behind his back) "a snuff-box stylist."

Comparable with this collector was Mr. Koussevitzky, when he set into the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—"for the first time in America"—a Symphony in D major by one, Rigel, transplanted German, who flourished modestly as conductor and composer in Paris, through the last forty years of the eighteenth century. Mr. Koussevitzky may pass for a collector of such ancient music. Within three months at Symphony Hall he has played more of it than did his predecessors in a whole season or even two. Some of these eighteenth-century pieces were interesting to hear—the Concerto of Vivaldi, for example. One or another was genuinely impressive, like Emanuel Bach's Concerto. Yet a third seemed mediocre, say the Symphony of Boccherini; while a fourth—possibly the Concerto of Corelli—proved downright dull.

A step further yesterday went the conductor when he played this Symphony of Rigel. It was his own discovery; in Paris he unearthed it. There and elsewhere in Europe he played it. Now, he was eager to disclose it to his new public in America. It is indeed a brief music; but it is also shallow and empty. No merit of invention or workmanship distinguishes it. Superficial and bodiless it passes, gnat-like, upon the air—mere pattern of the musical time and fashion in Paris A. D. 1770. It is naive; but it is not quaint. It prattles; but it hardly charms. Doubtless fifty Symphonies akin to it were played at the Concerts Spirituels and the Concerts de la Loge Olympique in the Paris of that day. Fortunately no conductor or editor has yet rediscovered them, collected them, laid them before his public. It was no less possible to be ephemeral and conventional with "the tone-art" in the eighteenth century than it is in the twentieth. Even the indefatigable Dr. Burney was occasionally bored with the musical company he encountered from London to Rome and Hamburg. There is no moral.

A far more agreeable and engaging trifle was the little Suite arranged by Rimsky-Korsakov from his opera of folk-tale and fantastical invention, "Christmas Eve." Therein we listeners kept company with comets and other heavenly bodies; heard a Czardas of falling stars; came to earth in a proud-paced, soundly rhythmed, Polonaise. Not only did we keep such entertaining company; but we heard also the sensuous charm, suavity and depth of Rimsky's voice when it is speaking in the wood-winds or the horns; the brightness of his tones when the strings are his instruments; his fancy and fertility in the devices of harmony and the play of timbres. Behold and hear a Rimsky who with a few suffusing chords and twinkling figures can outspread the star-pierced wintry heavens; who can set those stars a-dancing and persuade them into a fantastic Mazurka or Czardas; who knew comets and also the round dances of peasants and the polonaises of their betters. No doubt Rimsky's fantasy of vision sometimes outran his musical invention. Any lad at the conservatory will say that he repeats and embroiders rather than develops and deepens. Yet like the lady in the tale, he sins "charmingly, even beautifully"; while in these pieces from "Christmas Eve," the music keeps effortless pace with the fantasy. Rimsky was indeed a bearded and spectacled Professor in the Tsar's conservatory; but, when folk-lore tempted him, his measures played about.

Yet with Mr. Koussevitsky's Schubert—the Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony—we listeners were again on debating ground. First, last and all the time we shall be at odds over the conductor's version of the first movement. Half of us will say succinctly that we were "thrilled"; or, more extravagantly, that never before "had we heard such Schubert." The other half will reason higher and search deeper. Schubert's music—we shall say—may bear the weight and incisiveness of Mr. Koussevitsky laid upon the [illegible]ured chords until they crashed. We shall add that, having crashed, he languished in an excess of lyric song; that he over-contrasted a Schubert dramatic with a Schubert sentimental; while to be the one or the other—"to the limit"—was not Schubert's way. Saying these things, moreover, we dissenters shall not subscribe to the easy-going doctrine that Schubert's music runs of itself, the conductor's rein, as it were, upon the orchestral neck. Far from it; for Schubert can be "interpreted" (as current lingo has it) as well as the next composer—"interpreted" and thereby glorified.

The proof was Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the succeeding slow movement. Never was he more the masterful conductor, who had reflected upon the given music, absorbed, designed and shapened it, to give it forth anew in his own image. Upon the orchestra he laid a clear will. It responded with a plasticity, a euphony, a beauty of many voices, unsurpassed in the prime of its predecessor as Dr. Muck's band. Here was tone softly incandescent with its own loveliness; tone in which the voices melted each into each; tone that, moving, parted the air with an infinite and melancholy grace. Here at last was the Boston Symphony Orchestra—blessed be the day!—at the acme of instrumental song.

In many ears as well, it was also the song of Franz Schubert, setting hand to what, had he lived, might have been his masterpiece in symphonies. The design unfolded and there was beauty in the curving contours. The design was in motion, and rhythm gave it life. Light and shade glamoured the surfaces. The molding of a phrase, the fall of an accent, were like ripple upon them. The songful voice was neither distorted nor obscured. A musing melancholy still transfigured it. Suffused was it with the loveliness of musical sound from Schubert upspringing. Suffused was it also from the well of sentiment which was this same Schubert. From within outward pulsed the music. The ear heard it to the depths, bathed in the beauty of transcendent orchestral tone. Sustained line set it in relief; while half-lights, so fine were the gradations, played upon it. Only a pedant would scrutinize Mr. Koussevitzky's ways and means, his regard or disregard for prescription and tradition. His worst detractor might reproach him with no more than Schubert over-conducted and therefore denied the spontaneity of the free-throated and instinctive singer. Yet here was not the restlessness of individual striving; only the calm of matured and assured accomplishment. The end justifies the means when the beauty of Schubert, singer of instrumental song, is so distilled upon the air. And has Mr. Koussevitzky, when he chooses, such an ear for tone? On that score not a remembered conductor in this music has excelled him.

For the fifth time within eight months Stravinsky's tone-poem of primitive and pagan Russia, "The Rite of Spring," was heard in Symphony Hall. From so many repetitions here in Boston in so short a space, most of us have forgotten that it is also music to a ballet of picture, action, dances. Yet so graphic was Mr. Koussevitzky that time and again a few measures summoned, as in a flash of memory, the vision of the stage. Repetition, moreover, but deepens and confirms the original sensations. Here is rhythm raised to as high and diversified power as music has yet known. It scourges like whips. It pounds like the march of a tribe. It is various as the emotion and the imagery it would release. Here also is the new power of music moving in the mass, propelled by great chords, vivified by these rhythms, sustained by a kind of cyclopean design and progress. Here yet again is the new voice of barbaric harmonies, of timbres used for blow, and cut, and thrust, piercing, tearing, lacerating, suffocating at the composer's will. Yet in the new domain is room also for the old beauty, sharpened and intensified. Upon more than one passing page of "The Rite of Spring," Stravinsky still sings poignantly.

Above all the clatter about "absolute" music "moving in its own planes" "sufficient in its own sonorities,' here also is a tone-poem alive and vivid with imagery—objective it is true, but the more potent for that virtue. Chaikovsky looked in his heart and wrote, and over much music-paper wrestled with himself in subjective tones. Stravinsky looks in his mind, sees as well as feels, translates into music—say the stirring of energy in the spring of the earth and of the folk; say the dark and dread world that imprisons and bounds them: say the frenzy of sacrifice that shall bring them assurance and relief. Such images evoke this new music of power; that power stimulates new imaginings, until both give birth to the mighty pages that begin and end the second part of "The Rite of Spring." For the while, in Stravinsky's tone-poem, this music of modern might barbaric begins and ends. Of the composers that we in Boston hear Prokoviev—and still more Bliss—only echo it. The nearest approach is the axe-like weight and sharpness of Honegger's "Horatius."

To "Le Sacre," Mr. Koussevitzky brought abilities and a temperament that made it at once more musical, more savage and more puissant than could Mr. Monteux. A cool head, a controlling mind, a clear musical insight direct the conductor's sweeps and ardors. Thereby he sustained, as does Stravinsky himself, the structure, the coherence, the steadily marching, unfolding and culminating design of "The Rite of Spring." He adjusted proportions, set in details as expertly as though he had an eighteenth-century symphony in hand. He made the little as well as the big strokes. He accomplished certain fusions of the rhythm where it may have run wilder than even Stravinsky willed. At the same time, he deepened the rhythmic blows and heightened the rhythmic frenzies; welded closer and flung wider Stravinsky's masses of tone; sharpened harmonies, isolated timbres; in the more songful measures made precision pierce with beauty. The orchestra lent him lustres of tone for the games of the youth; tone in black depths for the beginning of the sacrifice; the tone that quivers with mystery and then beats with frenzy as the rite is achieved. Nearer and nearer come we listeners to the mingling of primeval power and acute sophistication which, musically, is "The Rite of Spring."

H. T. P.

A Debt of Honor

More Money Needed Now in the Guarantee-Fund for Opera

A MONTH hence, Bostonians of all degrees will be flocking to the Opera House to hear the operas and singers of the Chicago Company. However large and faithful the attendance at those sixteen performances, there will be a deficit to meet when they are done, divided pro rata among a body of guarantors—say 20, 25, 30 per cent of their several subscriptions. For a fair division of this deficit, the guarantee fund should touch at least $150,000. As it now stands, it is nearly $30,000 short of that sum and few seem disposed to contribute to it.

Many a well-to-do family is preparing to take the pleasure of this fortnight of opera, without a thought of the guarantee-fund that makes it possible. Or "Let the others pay," goes the careless word. "They are used to it." Some day, however, they may prefer to spend elsewhere the "opera-money" they are now contributing to the general Bostonian good. Then in an opera-less town, there will be weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth. . . .

Co-operation is the need of the hour at the offices of the Boston-Chicago Opera Association—not selfishness or indifference. Unless we are minded to let a few guarantors pay for the opera we enjoy, "right now" is the time to send a check, large or small, to the offices of The Association at 34 Federal Street. Who of us does not first pay his debts of honor? H. T. P.

Well on the Way

The Guarantee-Fund for the Symphony Orchestra Touches $77,330

BY report of the program-book at the Symphony Concert yesterday, approximately $3,600 has been added to the fund that offsets the slight deficit in the treasury of the orchestra. On Dec. 20, the sum total of subscriptions was $77,330.99, leaving $6,670 to be pledged out of a desired $84,000. "The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially." The speedier the help, the more assured and free-handed are the trustees. The list of recent subscribers' names:

Ames, Mrs. Hobart.
Atherton, Percy Lee.
Bigelow, Dr. W. S.
Bradley, Mrs. J. D. C.
Carr, Cornelia P.
Coffin, Winthrop.
Coleman, Miss E. L.
Cummings, Mr. and Mrs. C. K.
Eaton, Lucy H.
Fitz, Mrs. R. H.
Frothingham, Dr. and Mrs. Langdon.
Galacar, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic R.
Gilchrist, Olive B.
Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. F. W.
Holmes, Ida E.
Hood, Helen.
Houghton, Elizabeth G.
Howe, Mrs. J. Murray.
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe.
Hyde, Mrs. J. McE.
Latimer, Mr. and Mrs. George D.
Mason, Henry L.
Putnam, Mrs. George.
Ratshesky, Mr. and Mrs. A. C.
Saltonstall, Muriel Gurdon.
Sprague, Waldo C.
Stone, Mrs. William E.
Taft, Edward A.
Wheatland, Richard.
Worthington, Julia H.

Subscriptions, in any sum, should be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street.

"HE WHO GETS SLAPPED"

[illegible] Thursday evening Jan. 8, in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, the fourth of the current series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. Haydn's Symphony in G major; Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fêtes"; Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" fill the program. In the Concerto, Mr. Borovsky, lately heard in Boston, will play a solo-part inviting his powers.

Thursday evening, Jan. 8, in Jordan Hall, a concert by Curtis Kaltun, warmly received and highly praised at his debut a year ago. He will play Chopin's Sonata in B-minor; Schubert's Impromptu in B-flat; Johnanyi's Rhapsody in F-sharp minor; Liszt's Tarantella; miscellany by Debussy, Palmgren, Sibelius, Juon.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 9, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program lists Elgar's orchestral arrangement of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue, in C minor, for Organ; Respighi's new Concerto Gregoriano; "The Valkyrs' Ride," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Reinzi" from Wagner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
DEC 27 1924

The programs for the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon are, respectively: Overture to "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; "Unfinished" symphony, Schubert; symphony in D, Riegel; Le Sacre du Printemps, Stravinsky.

Concerto grosso, in D minor, opus 6, No. 10, Handel; Till Eulenspiegel, Strauss; piano concerto, No. 2, in C minor, Rachmaninov; Sergei Rachmaninov, soloist; suite from "El Amor Brujo," De Falla; La Valse, Ravel.

FROM CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
DEC 27 1924

No Tickets Available

For Concert Series of Boston Symphony Orchestra

The demand for tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both in Boston and in New York, has resulted in a complete sellout and there is not a ticket to be bought for either the regular concerts in Boston or the double series in New York. Furthermore, the additional series of five concerts on Monday evenings in Boston is now sold out for the season. It is said that never before in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the demand for tickets resulted in selling out the series of concerts; and the unprecedented sale this season can only be attributed to the new conductor, Koussevitsky, as even before he conducted the first concert the request for season tickets had exceeded all records.

Russian Leader Stirs New York

What music critics see as rivalry between famous orchestral conductors has been heightened by the recent debut in New York City of Serge Koussevitsky as director of the Boston Symphony. The metropolis, already engrossed in its three resident orchestras with their noted conductors, had further been thrilled by the virtuosity of Leopold Stokowski, leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra. That visiting band had thereby largely usurped the place of the Boston Symphony after its decline owing to the wartime misadventures of its former conductor, Karl Muck. That is to say, the one-time full houses—sold out by subscription—of the Boston players had descended to Stokowski and his Philadelphia men. With the coming of its Russian leader, Koussevitsky, the Boston orchestra becomes again the town talk and New York faces the enlivening prospect of standing-room-only for both visiting ensembles besides the devoted publics, respectively, of its Philharmonic and New York Symphony, as well as the newer State Symphony.

The conductors of the two visiting orchestras are contrasted as to methods by a writer for the New York Times. Says he:

"The personality of Stokowski is a little sharper of outline and perhaps harder of substance than that of his colleague. He is more of the martinet, it is said, with his men; they nevertheless admire him. In rehearsal Stokowski goes relentlessly and impersonally for what he wants. He usually sits on a high stool, with a carafe of water by his side, and works persistently, unromantically, with the most impersonal ardor for his artistic ends. He is oblivious to anything but the fact that there is a human machine before him that can, must, and will carry out his designs.

"This does not mean that he lacks emotional quality, or that, in performance, he fails to pour out nervous force and expend physical energy in a manner that might dumfound an iron-jawed business man or an athlete if they could go through a similar experience. Quite the contrary. He appears on the platform with an effect that is native to him, yet also, without doubt, well calculated for its impression on the audience. That is, he emerges quite suddenly from the wings, walks quickly to the conductor's stand, where the orchestra is completely prepared for him, raises his baton and begins almost before his audience has caught its breath. In New York he conducts everything from memory. In Philadelphia he plays certain works from score. Interpreting music, his slender and erect figure, the decision of his gestures of the man are familiar. They never fail to evoke results.

"Koussevitsky's methods are, in a certain large way, a little less precise and intensive. He is a man of boiling enthusiasms, of much sensibility and of generous and buoyant disposition. He has always done things in a big way.

Koussevitsky, the conductor, is acutely the master of himself when he leads the orchestra. His blood seems to run hot and cold at once. He will stir the men to a frenzy of enthusiasm and keep them at a white heat for hours. All the time he is watching the smallest details and he will stop the whole excited band at any second, for any number of times, to analyze in the most frigid and deliberate manner a technical detail or a shading that is not precisely what he wishes. He will at times exhort his men and give them some little illustrations of what he wants.

"He treats them as companions and colleagues, but not too much as colleagues, retaining control, causing not only respect but even trepidation from those who do not exactly obey him."

"Koussevitsky gained admission to the Conseratory by promising to study the double bass, an instrument that happened to be much needed at that time in the conservatory orchestra. He played the double bass as no man born in Russia—or perhaps anywhere else—had made it sound before." From National Bureau for the Advancement of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 28 1924

Boston Symphony.

At Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening of this week Serge Koussewitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer the following program:

Berlioz.....Overture, Carnivale Romaine
Rigel.....Symphony in D major
Strawinsky.....Sacre du Printemps

The Saturday matinee program will be identical with that offered on Friday evening at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, announcement of which will be found elsewhere on this page.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
DEC 28 1924

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 28 1924

MUSIC from Germany, Russia, Spain and France will make up the second program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy next Friday evening, Jan. 2.

The soloist will be Serge Rachmaninow, the Russian composer and pianist, who will play with the orchestra in his own Second Concerto in C minor. The Russian composer and conductor have been associated many times in their careers, Koussevitzky having both published and performed the music of his countryman.

Koussevitzky will open the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, for string orchestra and solo string quartet. The second number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the closing number a newer score now also well known, Ravel's "La Valse," a fantastic and dramatic poem in music through which runs the waltz measures of Vienna in the Nineteenth Century.

The novelty of the evening will be by De Falla, the Spanish composer. It is a Suite drawn from his ballad, "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"). The argument concerns a Spanish girl and her exacting lover, who dies. He returns as a still jealous ghost to haunt and dismay her in her new love affair.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
DEC 28 [illegible]

Rachmaninoff to Appear With Boston Orchestra

Music from Germany, Russia, Spain and France will lend variety and interest to the second program of the season here to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy next Friday evening, Jan. 2.

The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who will appear with the orchestra in his own second Concerto in C minor. The Russian composer and conductor have been associated many times in their careers, for Koussevitzky has both published and performed the music of his countryman. From this close understanding it is natural to expect an illuminating joint performance of this celebrated concerto.

Koussevitzky will open the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra and solo string quartet. The second number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the closing numbers a newer score now also well known—Ravel's "La Valse," a fantastic and dramatic poem in music through which runs the waltz measures of Vienna in the nineteenth century. The notable novelty of the evening will be by De Falla, the Spanish composer; it is a suite drawn from his ballad "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer.") The argument is about a Spanish girl and her exacting jealous lover who dies. He returns as a still jealous ghost to haunt and dismay her in her new love affair.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
DEC 28 1924

Koussevitzky

Koussevitsky, Russian director of the Boston Symphony, told the New York "Times" what he thought of jazz. Said he:

"Jazz is an important contribution to modern musical literature. It has an epochal significance. It should not be downed. It is not an indication of bad taste. It is not superficial. It is fundamental. Jazz comes from the soil, where all music has its beginning. It marks the turbulence of the times, the energy and bustle of a people. It is good music because it responds to the longings of a people. If it went against their natures it would not be good music."

"Music changes with the times," he continued. "Nobody liked Beethoven at first. A friend of mine in Berlin, a great collector of manuscripts, has an old journal commenting upon the Third Symphony of Beethoven's, the day after it was played. 'What awful music,' runs the account. 'No one will ever stand it. It was the worst thing I ever listened to.' When Wagner was first played the people put their fingers in their ears."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 28 1924

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts will take place on Jan. 9 and 10, since this week will be occupied by the second New York trip. At these concerts the soloist will be Albert Spalding, who will play Respighi's Gregorian Concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky will also present J. S. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings and an orchestral arrangement by Elgar of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in C minor. The latter part of the program will comprise three Wagnerian excerpts, "The Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and overture to "Rienzi."

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week here, as the orchestra will be in New York. For Jan 9 and 10 the program now announced includes Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," with Albert Spalding as violinist, Bach's Third "Brandenburg Concerto," Elgar's arrangement of Bach's organ fantasy and fugue in C minor, and three Wagner excerpts, "The Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin," and overture to "Rienzi."

Two of these Wagner excerpts are poorly chosen. The "Ride of the Valkyries" is too fragmentary and the "Rienzi" overture too bombastic and hackneyed to deserve performance at Symphony concerts. Both pieces are very popular with the "Pops" audience, but that is no reason for giving them in the regular series. Also, both of them were very recently performed under Monteux at the regular series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 28 1924

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts on January 9 and 10, the soloist will be Albert Spalding, who will play Respighi's "Gregoriano Concerto." Koussevitzky will also present Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto" for strings, Edgar's "Fantasia and Fugue" and three Wagnerian excerpts, "The Ride of the Valkyries," prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Rienzi" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DEC 27 1924

Hell in Boston

When Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, the Russian composer, was about 37, a critic told him that he was past his prime. In his mind, at these unkind words, he heard the dwindling strophe of the heart's small drum, tapping into silence up an empty street. He sat down to write his tone-poem, Francesca da Rimini. Down in Hell's gilded street, the phantoms jostle; winds squeal like demented fiddles; ghosts squeak like dismal flutes; and lonely in the company of lovers who have sinned for love and have been damned for their sin to remember forever the joy of love's delight, Paolo and Francesca embrace in pangs and torment. But Tschaikowsky believed that he had lived his best years; his hand faltered. The music twists and tumbles, witless in anguish. Hell is peopled with platitudes. The cruel critic was right. The piece marks the first faltering of Tschaikowsky's genius, and for this reason, it is not often played by the great orchestras.

Last week, M. Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, played it in Boston. Superbly he conducted; magnificently the orchestra responded.

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Music from Germany, Russia, Spain and France will lend variety and interest to the second program of the season here to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Academy next Friday evening. The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, who will appear with the orchestra in his own Second Concerto in C minor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
GLOBE
News
DEC 29 1924

ANNUAL CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

EMPIRE THEATER FILLED—MISS ETHEL LEGINSKA PIANO SOLOIST.

The Empire Theater was filled almost to capacity Sunday afternoon, for the annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Woman's Club of Fall River. These symphony concerts are an institutive lure now, and concert-goers are indebted to the Woman's Club for making them possible. What these concerts have meant to the cultural life of Fall River, cannot be estimated.

Great interest was felt in the appearance of the new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He is the first Russian leader of the orchestra, and is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard until this season. His manner of conducting is quiet; in fact at times his motions were scarcely perceptible, but there was always the vital force and magnetism of a great conductor. Mr. Monteux left the band in a higher state of perfection, and Mr. Koussevitzky, since his coming, has drilled and polished it until it responds to his every wish. He can produce an extreme pianissimo, which seems to be a specially of his, and on the other and at times, seems to fairly pull great climaxes from the orchestra. His reading of the different compositions presented is always interesting. Modest in bearing, he follows the gracious custom of having his men share in the applause, which happened twice yesterday.

The program was surprisingly conventional. To the disappointment of some and the relief of others, no ultramodern composition was heard, though Mr. Koussevitzky is known to be partial to present day writings, and has included them in his concerts elsewhere. Perhaps Fall River is considered too conservative to enjoy such cubist compositions, if they may be so called, as "Pacific 231" and others, but the inclusion of one in a program occasionally would give people who cannot attend concerts elsewhere a chance to know something of the new ideas which are permeating the musical world. The program follows:

Berlioz ..... Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Wagner ..... Bacchanale ("The Hill of Venus") from "Tannhauser"
Liszt ..... Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-tunes, for Pianoforte and Orchestra
Tschaikowsky .... Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante Cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse; Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

The overture, "The Roman Carnival," had some attractive themes and was brilliantly played. The Bacchanale from Tannhauser was superbly played, and was a veritable orgy of revelry, diminishing into the exhaustion which follows such tumult.

The soloist of the afternoon was Ethel Leginska, pianist, who played Fantasia in Hungarian Folk tunes by Liszt, with orchestral accompaniment. Miss Leginska is not only a pianist, but is a composer, and lately has conducted as well. She is an English girl, who is one of the foremost woman pianists on the concert platform today. She has won her enviable position by unusual talent and sheer hard work. She was even obliged to Russianize her name to obtain recognition. She is one of 18 famous pianists to play in music at the piano festival, which is to be held at the Metropolitan Opera House on Dec. 30 for the benefit of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor. Dressed in a severely plain black velvet dress, only relined by a lace collar, she presented an almost boyish appearance. Of slight figure, the powerful tone she drew from her instrument was all the more surprising, and not once was she over-balanced by the orchestra. Her playing was also characterized by extreme delicacy and a touch of feathery lightness which, however, carried to every part of the theater. The Liszt Fantasia was well adapted to show her versatile technic and fiery interpretation. At its close she was given an ovation and was recalled many times.

Mr. Koussevitsky introduced an innovation by placing the symphony last on the program and also by playing the four movements with practically no pause between, thus eliminating applause until the end of the finale. This seems to be a wise proceeding, for if a symphony has cohesion and unity, as it should, it is made more apparent than when it is played in fragments, as it were. The symphony chosen was Tschaikowsky's fifth. The sixth has been played here several times, including last year, and the fourth was played three years ago, but the fifth was given its first appearance yesterday. It is a very beautiful symphony, and Mr. Koussevitsky gave it a masterly interpretation. The principal theme is sombre and dominating, characteristic of Tschaikowsky, and is announced by clarinets. The second movement, considered as a romance, is poignantly beautiful, and once heard can never be forgotten. The third movement, a waltz, is also lovely, and toward the very end is heard afar off the theme of the symphony. The finale is full of storm and fury, with allusions to the chief theme of the symphony. There was great applause at the close.

The next concert in the course will be given on Feb. 9 by Cecelia Dingen, violinist, and Percy Grainger, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS AT EMPIRE

Capacity Audience Thrilled by Program Splendidly Conducted by Serge Koussevitsky.

Interest centered yesterday afternoon, at the second Woman's club concert, in Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his magnetic personality and his marvelous playing on the big instrument, composed of so many men, was instantly noticeable. Ethel Leginska, brilliant young pianist, was the soloist. The Empire theatre was filled with an unusually appreciative audience. In fact, Mr. Koussevitzky motioned for the orchestra to rise and acknowledge the applause several times.

The following program was given:
Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival"
Wagner—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"
Liszt—Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-tunes, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64.
Andante; allegro, con anima
Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
Valse; allegro moderato.
Finale—Andante maestoso; allegro vivace.

In the matter of leadership, Mr. Koussevitzky swayed the mighty orchestra as one man, and the crescendos and diminuendos seemed to follow the rise and fall of his baton, as steel follows a magnet. He achieved mere whispers of sound, exquisite in their pale shining, and the texture of his louder passages was rich and beautiful.

The program dealt with the old established composers, instead of offering the much-discussed modern music so high in favor at present. But why wish for the tang of modern flavor, when given a perfect thing, although of another vintage? Naturally, there has been much curiosity over Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," which enraptured audiences in other cities have heard repeated at concerts this season, thus shattering a custom, long established, of not giving encores. However, a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is a joy, whatever the music chosen, and yesterday's concert struck at the heart of things, producing an effect not often realized in the music itself and also on the listeners.

The orchestral accompaniment to the soloist was well-balanced, sufficiently restrained, and at no time overpowering.

Ethel Leginska, vivid as a darting flame, won her audience at her first appearance. Her style is individual, compelling, and unhackneyed, and she infuses life and interest into everything she plays. Under her flashing fingers, the music glows with color-crashing fortissimo or faintest murmurings of sound, and the myriad varieties of tone painting—all done with a gypsy charm—a delightful seeming to take her hearers into her confidence. Her return to this city in the future would be something to look forward to with pleasure.

The next concert in the Woman's club series will be given Feb. 9 by Percy Grainger, pianist, and Cecilia Hansen, violinist.

228

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
GLOBE
DEC 29 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT A TREAT

Conductor, Soloist and Musicians Afford Pleasure to Capacity Audience

The Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Kossevitsky as conductor and Ethel Leginska as soloist, afforded a capacity audience immeasurable pleasure in the second concert of the season given yesterday afternoon at the Empire theatre under the auspices of the Woman's Club. Music lovers have grown to expect much of the Boston Symphony orchestra and perhaps for that reason much of the interest centered about the personality o fthe new conductor. At the close of the concert the Fall River audience testified by its prolonged applause that it had added its approbation to that which Serge Koussevitsky has received everywhere that he has appeared. There is much vitality and dignity to this new conductor with whom every motion is one of grace. He seems possessed of unlimited ability for drawing forth the finest results from his musicians and such was his magnetism that they found pleasure in giving their best efforts to him.

His program was so arranged as to display the scope of the musical style of the orchestra. There was the overture, "Romain Carnial," Op 9, by Berlioz; Wagner's Bacchanale, "The Hills of Venus," from Tannhauser, the Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes, by Liszt, played by Ethel Leginska with the orchestral accompaniment, and lastly the crowning offering, Tchaikovsky's Symphony number 5 in E Minor, Op 64. "The Carnival Romain," one of the gayest and most brilliant of all orchestral overtures, was exquisitely handled. The slow introduction by the English horn, which is taken up by the stringed instruments and then changes into the mad carnival dance was superbly shaded and blended. In the Bacchanale so well was the wild dance of the nymphs and satyre depicted that one followed the theme with ease and enjoyment throughout. At its opening lively, animated and quick it grows faster and faster until one marvelled at the technique of the musicians, then it died down to a soft and beautiful melody which signifies the victory of the Graces of the mad subjects of Venus. It was a dance of a vastly different nature than that of the Carnival which preceded it and this difference was well portrayed by the skillful musicians.

Ethel Leginska, pianist, gave her only solo in the "Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-tunes," which was played with the orchestra. Perhaps the entire audience was surprised when the soloist came upon the stage. She was quite small and slight and looked like a mere girl. As she sat at the piano waiting for the opening one wondered that so slight an artist should be the soloist for this orchestra, but when she played then the most sincere a compliment that could be paid her is that she is a soloist worthy of the Boston Symphony orchestra, ranking with such pianist as Hoffmon. Legenska played with fire and exquisite technique. Silvery runs, alternated with passages of fire and heaviness which have ever been the characteristic of the Hungarian music. She played the music as Hoffman. Legenska played with earned curtain call upon curtain call. Her reception upon completion of her offering was quite in the nature of an ovation.

Tchaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony" brought the program to a close and was a perfect ending. Here the tonal magnificence of the orchestra was revealed in all its beauty. Each movement of the symphony was a contrast to the one which preceded it, the first, Andante. Allegro con Anima; the second, Andante Cantabile, con alcuna licenza, Valse, the third, played Allegro moderato and the finale, Andanta maestro, Allegro vivace. Each movement was delightful, but it was at its close that the orchestra reached the heights of its art. The closing was as near to perfection as one expects to hear and musicians and audience seemed to realize the energy and magnetism of the conductor who made by his skill such a rendition a possibility. When the concert was over such was the enthusiasm of those present that for the moment one rather expected the entire audience to rise to its feet in tribute to the worth of the music, musicians and conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
EVENING UNION
DEC 31 1924

Symphony Here Sunday.

The great musical event of the season will take place Sunday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their annual concert under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. in the Municipal Auditorium.

Last year an additional interest was added to the coming of this most popular organization by the fact that it was the occasion of Pierre Monteux's last appearance as its conductor. On Sunday next an equal interest will be evinced in the first appearance in this city of his successor, Sergel Koussevitsky, famous Russian. A special program has been prepared for the occasion, which will be published in the papers later in the week.

The concert will commence at 3 o'clock. The side doors will be opened at 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.40 which will give ample time for the audience to get seated.

Tickets, both season and free, can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. and the principal music stores in the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 31 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now in its forty-fourth year, comes to Hartford for one concert this season under the management of Frank A. Sedgwick and will be heard in the Capitol theater on Sunday afternoon February 1. This occasion will introduce to Hartford one of the greatest personalities in the musical world, the orchestra's new conductor Serge Koussevitsky.

His great success in Boston and New York is the talk of the moment among music lovers. His manner of conducting is interesting and Deems Taylor, critic of the New York World says this of it: "Mr. Koussevitsky's beat is angular and decisive and must be easy to follow. In quite passages he beats almost entirely from the wrist, in a very small arc, widening the arc and using his full arm only in moments of stress. His most individual gesture is to thrust his left arm sharply overhead, the palm of the hand flat, to indicate a sudden pianissimo (a dynamic change of which he seems fond). Although his conducting is always electric with energy, his practice of keeping both feet firmly planted and his body motionless gives the impression of fundamental poise and complete self-mastery." The advance sale for, this notable event indicates that even the ample capacity of the Capitol theater will be taxed to the utmost. The seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's music store, No. 139 Asylum street. Mail will also be accepted.

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
ASA L. [illegible] & SONS STATIONERS

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND